1. By this verified Petition, Fabian Farnia, through his attorneys, Thomas F. Coleman and Jay M. Kohorn, petitions this Court for a writ of prohibition/mandate.
2. On August 30, 1979, Petitioner was arrested by undercover officers employed by the Los Angeles Police Department Vice Detail for a violation of subdivision (b) of Section 647 of the California Penal Code.
3. In September, 1979 the Los Angeles City Attorney caused to be filed with the Municipal Court of the Los Angeles Judicial District, a complaint alleging that Petitioner did willfully and unlawfully solicit another person to engage in and did engage in an act of prostitution.
4. The arraignment of Petitioner was continued from time to time and on February 19, 1980, Petitioner filed a Demurrer to the Complaint, challenging the jurisdiction of the Municipal Court, the sufficiency of the complaint and the constitutionality of the statute.

1 A copy of the Demurrer is attached hereto as Exhibit A.

2 5. The case was again continued from time to time in order for 3 the City Attorney to have sufficient time to prepare and file an 4 Answer to the Demurrer.

5 6. The case was then set for oral argument on May 14, 1980 in 6 Division 57 of the Los Angeles Municipal Court, Honorable David 7 Rothman presiding. Immediately preceding oral argument the 8 cases of some 16 other defendants charged with similar offenses 9 were consolidated with Petitioner's case for argument and decision.

10 7. The underlying case, to which this Petition is directed, 11 is entitled "People of the State of California v. Fabian Farnia, 12 Municipal Court case no. 31135003."

13 8. The court to which this Court is asked to direct the 14 appropriate writ or writs is the Municipal Court of Los Angeles 15 Judicial District.

16 9. On June 20, 1980, Judge Rothman issued an Order overruling 17 the demurrer and filed a Memorandum of Decision. That Memorandum 18 of Decision is attached hereto as Exhibit B.

19 10. The case of People v. Farnia is now set for trial in the 20 Municipal Court, Division 40, on August 20, 1980.

21 11. Unless restrained by this Court, the Municipal Court will 22 act in excess of its jurisdiction by causing Petitioner (and the 23 other companion cases) to be tried under a statute which is 24 unconstitutional on its face and as previously interpreted by 25 California appellate courts. Until the constitutional defects 26 are cured by our appellate courts, Section 647, subdivision (b) 27 is, and will continue to be, unconstitutional for the reasons set 28 forth in the Demurrer (Exhibit A) and more amply set forth in the 29 Memorandum of Points and Authorities which accompanies this 30 Petition.

31 12.. Judge Rothman's decision, while overruling the Demurrer and 32 stating reasons why he felt that Petitioner's privacy, due process, 33 equal protection, and free speech arguments were without merit, 34 does not define the terms "prostitution" or "any lewd act" as used 35 in subdivision (b) of Section 647 P.C. The only appellate decision 36 which directly interprets those terms as a jury would be instructed,

1 is the case of People v. Norris (1978) 88 C.A.3d Supp. 32, in 2 which the Appellate Department of this Court held that the 3 phrase "any lewd act" as used in this statute, should be defined as 4 conduct which is "lustful, lascivious, unchaste, wanton, or loose 5 in morals and conduct." That definition has been indirectly 6 overruled by the cases of Pryor v. Municipal Court (1979) 25 C.3d
7 238 and People v. Hill (1980) 163 Cal.Rptr. 99. The Pryor case 8 disapproved of such a definition of "lewd" as used in subdivision 9 (a) of Section 647. The Hill case stated that the new definition 10 of "lewd" established by the Pryor case must also be used in 11 prosecutions under California's pimping and pandering statute, and 12 by implication, in cases under subdivision (b) of Section 647 P.C.
13 Unfortunately, California courts are in conflict as to what the 14 definition of "lewd" must be for 647(b) cases. Some courts have 15 held that it will be defined as conduct involving a touching of the 16 genitals, buttocks, or female breast for purposes of sexual arousal 17 gratification annoyance or offense. Other courts have held that 18 there must be an additional requirement that the defendant knew 19 or should have known of the presence of persons who may be offended.
20 For an example of the former definition see People v. Fitzgerald, 21 San Diego Superior Court Appellate Department No. CR 47640 (attached 22 hereto as Exhibit C.) For an example of the more stringent definition 23 see People v. Sotello, Municipal Court case no. 625374, and 24 specifically Judge Paul I. Metzler's "Order Overruling Demurrer and 25 Constitutionally Construing Statute", attached as Exhibit D.

26 13. Until the definition of "prostitution" and "any lewd act" 27 is finally resolved and a uniform definition is derived for use 28 by the trial courts, several constitutional principles are and 29 will continue to be violated. Article 4, Section 16 of the 30 California Constitution requires that laws of a general nature be 31 uniform in operation. This provision is obviously being violated 32 when some defendants get the benefit of the "full definition" of 33 "lewd" established by Pryor and where other defendants are being 34 subjected to trial under a partial definition. Also, a defendant 35 is entitled to notice, in advance of trial, as to what definition 36 of the crime he will be held to answer. Since the law in this

1 area is unsettled and since there is no binding decision by a 2 court of statewide jurisdiction on this issue, Petitioner (as 3 well as other defendants) have to guess as to whether a particular 4 judge will define the crime as it was in Sotello or as it was in 5 Fitzgerald. Advance knowledge of this definition will, of course, 6 drastically affect trial tactics, choice of witnesses, or even 7 the decision as to whether the defendant should testify or not.
8 Therefore, no matter how this Court resolves the other issues 9 presented in this case, it should resolve the definitional problem 10 so that Petitioner will have advance knowledge of the standard by 11 which he will be judged at trial.

12 14. No other petition for an extraordinary writ has been filed 13 with any other court.

14 15. Petitioner has no other plain, adequate, or speedy remedy 15 than by this Petition. Petitioner cannot receive a fair trial 16 until the issues presented herein are resolved by a court of 17 greater jurisdiction than the Municipal Court.

18 16. Petitioner requests that this Court appoint attorney Thomas 19 F. Coleman to represent him in this proceeding. Petitioner's 20 Request for Appointment of Counsel and Financial Declaration are 21 already on file with this Court.

22 17. Attorneys for some or all of the other defendants whose 23 cases were joined with that of Petitioner in the Municipal Court 24 will be filing brief requests to join in this proceeding within 25 a few days of this Petition being filed with this Court.

27 WHEREFORE, Petitioner prays that this Court:

28

29 1. Appoint Thomas F. Coleman to represent him in this 30 proceeding;

31 2. Allow the other defendants whose cases were joined 32 with that in the Municipal Court to join in this proceeding 33 upon condition that they file a brief request to that effect 34 with this Court;

35 3. Issue a temporary restraining order, restraining the 36 Municipal Court of the Los Angeles Judicial District from 1 proceeding to trial in the case of People v. Farnia, case no.

2 31135003, and from proceeding to trial in other cases which 3 were joined with the Farnia case in the Municipal Court if 4 said defendants file such a request with this Court. Said
5 Municipal Court should be restrained from taking any action 6 in the Farnia or other associated cases until further order 7 of this Court;

8 4. Issue an Alternative Writ of Prohibition to the 9 Municipal Court of the Los Angeles Judicial District, directing 10 that court to refrain from proceeding to trial in the case 11 of People v. Farnia (and other associated cases) because of 12 the apparent constitutional overbreadth of Section 647(b) P.C., 13 or to show cause before this Court why the Municipal Court 14 should not be so enjoined;

15 5. Issue an Alternative Writ of Mandate to the Municipal 16 Court of the Los Angeles Judicial District, directing that 17 Court to vacate its order overruling the demurrer in the case 18 of People v. Farnia et al. and instead to enter an order 19 sustaining the demurrer, or to show cause before this Court 20 why it should not sustain the demurrer;

21 6. After having issued one or more of the above-requested 22 orders, to grant to Petitioner a hearing on the merits of this 23 Petition;

24 7. After such hearing, to declare the engaging portion of 25 the statute unconstitutional in violation of the right to privacy 26 and in violation of due process of law; to sever the engaging 27 portion from the soliciting portion of the statute; to con-28 strue the solicitation portion as outlined in the Memorandum of 29 Points and Authorities submitted herewith; or, if the Court 30 declines to take such action, to construe the term "prostitution" 31 to be limited to conduct involving the "touching of the genitals, 32 buttocks, or female breast, for purposes of sexual arousal, 33 gratification, annoyance, or offense, when the actor knows or 34 should know of the presence of persons who may be offended."

35 8. To issue a Peremptory Writ or Writs, directed to the 36 Municipal Court of the Los Angeles Judicial District, commanding

1 that Court to refrain from taking any action in the case of 2 People v. Farnia (and associated cases) which would be inconsistent 3 with the Opinion of this Court granting all or portions of the 4 relief requested in paragraph 7 of this prayer.

5 9. For such other and further relief as this Court may 6 deem appropriate and just.

EXHIBIT A

1 Now comes the Defendant and demurs to the complaint charging 2 him with a violation of subdivision (b) of Section 647 of the 3 California Penal Code, i.e., soliciting and/or engaging in an act of 4 prostitution.

5 The Defendant asserts that the Court lacks jurisdiction to 6 proceed in this matter, other than to hear and decide the demurrer, 7 for the following reasons:

8 1. The state and federal constitutions guarantee each person 9 the right to privacy. Persons above 18 years of age have the right 10 to engage in consenting sexual activity in California so long as 11 that activity occurs in private. It is a violation of that right to 12 privacy to restrict the right to offer or receive any form of con-13 sideration for such legal activity. As a result, subdivision (b) is 14 unconstitutional.

15 2. This section is further violative of the right to privacy, 16 and is overbroad in that it infringes on the rights of patients 17 undergoing psychological treatment to participate in therapy where 18 such therapy involves the use of sexual surrogates who are paid a 19 fee for participating in such therapy. This section infringes on 20 the decision of both the doctor and patient in that it prohibits the 21 use of paid sexual surrogates even though this may be the recom-22 mended form of therapy.

23 3. Sex is a basic right guaranteed by the state and federal 24 constitutional provisions of freedom of speech, right to privacy, 25 and life and liberty under the due process clauses, and other rights 26 reserved to the People under the Ninth Amendment to the United 27 States Constitution. Section 647(b) violates these provisions by 28 prohibiting sex for a consideration under any and all circumstances, 29 without a compelling state interest.

30 4. By denying sex whenever any consideration is involved, 31 Section 647(b) is violative of the due process clauses of the state 32 and federal constitutions in that such a prohibition is arbitrary, 33 unreasonable, and irrational.

34 5. Section 647(b) contravenes the due process provisions of 35 the state and federal constitutions in that the state allows persons 36 over 18 years of age to engage in any form of consenting sex in

1 private and to solicit for such conduct, but 647(b) deprives persons 2 of the right to engage in or solicit for such conduct if any form of 3 consideration is involved. This condemns to lifetimes of celibacy 4 without due process those persons who, for reasons such as age or 5 physical unattractiveness, are unable to obtain sexual partners 6 without offering some form of consideration. There is no rational 7 state interest in forbidding the offering of consideration by such a 8 person when the offer is made in private to another consenting 9 adult.

10 6. This subdivision is unconstitutionally overbroad in viola-11 tion of the state and federal constitutional protections of freedom 12 of speech in that it prohibits all requests to engage in sex for a 13 consideration, regardless of whether the request is made in public 14 or in private, is discrete or offensive, whether the parties are 15 strangers or intimates, whether the consideration is commercial or 16 social, whether the proposed sexual conduct is to be performed for 17 recreational or therapeutic purposes, or whether the consideration 18 is for a lawful or an unlawful act.

19 7. This subdivision is unconstitutionally vague in that the 20 definition of "prostitution" is dependent upon the meaning of the 21 phrases "any lewd act" and "other consideration."

22 For the foregoing reasons, any one of which is sufficient, the 23 Defendant requests that this Court sustain the demurrer.

4 MEMORANDUM OF DECISION

5 The hearing on the demurrer in the above-entitled 6 matters was argued on May 14, 1980, in Division 57 of the above-7 entitled Court, and the matter submitted for decision based upon 8 the argument and papers filed on behalf of the parties. The 9 Court set June 20, 1980, for appearance of the parties and for 10 rendition of a decision.

11 Defendants are each charged with a violation of Penal 12 Code Section 647(b), soliciting or engaging in an act of 13 prostitution.

14 Defendants demur on a range of grounds, but concede that 15 the central ground is that Penal Code Section 647, Subsection (b), 16 is unconstitutional insofar as it makes criminal the offense of 17 privately engaging in an act of prostitution, as distinguished 18 from acts of public solicitation of prostitution.^{1/}

19 Plaintiff contends that defendants lack standing to 20 assert such a claim. However, since the prosecution chose to 21 charge both engaging and soliciting, the

24 ^{1/} Penal Code Section 647, Subsection (b), provides that any 25 person "who solicits anyone to engage in or who engages in any 26 act of prostitution" is guilty of disorderly conduct. Prosti-27 tution in this section "includes any lewd act between persons 28 for money or other consideration."

1 defendants have standing to enter this challenge, even though 2 ultimately the People's evidence may only relate to solicitation.

3 Defendants argue that because of significant legal 4 developments in the area of privacy, the courts must reexamine 5 the validity of Section 647(b), citing the enactment in 1972 of 6 a constitutional amendment concerning privacy (Article 1, 7 Section 1, of the California Constitution), the enactment of the 8 so-called "Brown Bill" in 1975, putting certain private consensual 9 sexual conduct beyond criminal sanctions, and the case of Pryor 10 v. Municipal Court (1979), 25 C. 3d 238.

11 The expanded notion of a right of privacy does not 12 place engaging in commercial sexual conduct beyond criminal 13 sanction.^{2/} The right of privacy, under even an expanded view 14 of its breadth, does not protect people from government inter-15 ference with their private planning of criminal acts, or their 16 engaging in criminal acts in private. If the conduct is properly 17 the subject of a criminal sanction, the privacy of its commission 18 is of no significance, and does not clothe the offense with some 19 sort of constitutional protection. The issue is whether the 20 Legislature's criminalization of commercial sex is an otherwise 21 proper exercise of the police power. If so, it is irrelevant 22 that the offense may be committed in public or private.

25 26
27

2/ Plaintiff's view that the Privacy Amendment relates only to 28 control of government surveillance is without merit.

1 Defendants make much of the fact that Penal Code 2 Section 647(b) bans a species of private consensual sexual 3 conduct. This, as well, is a matter of no significance in 4 judging validity. No case has yet held that sexual conduct is 5 constitutionally protected in the same way that speech is 6 protected. Sexual conduct has long been the subject of legitimate 7 legislative concern.

8 The progressive elimination of certain areas of sexual 9 conduct from penal sanction has not come as the result of 10 judicial expansion of constitutional protection, but from a 11 legislative determination that the penal sanction is no longer 12 appropriate. The elimination in 1975 of the crimes of adultery 13 and sodomy are examples. This did not occur through a court 14 determination expanding the right of sexual privacy.

15 There are a number of tests to determine whether a law 16 is a constitutional exercise of the police power: (1) If 17 the conduct is in the sphere of constitutionally protected 18 behavior (such as free expression), there must exist a compelling 19 reason for government intervention; (2) if the conduct is in the 20 accepted ambit of the police power, the law must reasonably relate 21 to a legitimate governmental purpose; and, finally, (3) in 22 reviewing any legislative enactment, the unconstitutionality 23 thereof must be clear, positive and unmistakable.

24 This Court finds nothing in Penal Code Section 647, 25 Subsection (b), that relates to conduct constitutionally 26 protected by the Bill of Rights or the right to privacy under 27 the California Constitution. The privacy aspect of the prohibited 28 conduct is incidental to the crime. Freedom of speech does not

1 give protection to the solicitation of prostitution, any more 2 than it protects solicitation of any criminal conduct. Section 3 647, Subsection (b), does not make certain kinds of speech a 4 crime, nor does it make sex a crime. It simply makes unlawful the 5 soliciting or engaging in certain conduct which is properly 6 the subject of criminal sanctions.

7 Accordingly, the applicable test is that applied to 8 any exercise of the police power: Does the law reasonably relate 9 to a legitimate government purpose? Defendants believe that 10 there is no reasonable basis in support of the criminalization 11 of commercial sex. The Court disagrees. Without passing on the 12 soundness of each of the possible reasons for banning prostitu-13 tion,^{3/} the Court is satisfied that currently accepted standards 14 of sexual freedom have not changed the fact that prostitution 15 is almost universally regarded in the United States as a social 16 evil. No responsible person could argue that prostitution is, 17 in general, good for the society, or good for the people that 18 engage in it, or that it is behavior that ought to be encouraged.
 19 Even those who have repeatedly urged the California Legislature 20 to legalize prostitution are not heard to base their argument on 21 its worthiness. It is still generally viewed as a social evil,

 24 ^{3/} The alleged harms of prostitution have been listed as, among 25 others, including: promotion of venereal disease; links to 26 organized crime; promotion of associated crimes, such as theft, 27 drugs, etc.; harm to public morality; offensive nature of public 28 solicitation; and the harm to prostitutes themselves.

1 even though there might be some cases in which sexual intercourse 2 for money could have some therapeutic value.

3 So long as there exists some reasonable basis for the 4 law, it is of no moment that other reasons for the law are base-5 less. In performing this review function, the Court does not 6 engage in the legislative process, but merely seeks to determine 7 whether there is a reasonable basis for the prohibition--even 8 if reasonable minds might differ on the subject.

9 The preservation of human dignity and of the family are 10 obviously values which the Legislature can legitimately consider 11 in enacting laws. The value of the family as a cornerstone of 12 almost every civilization in history cannot be overemphasized.
13 The importance of the preservation of the dignity of the 14 individual in our culture is still a fundamental value. Although 15 one could easily question the assertion that legalization of 16 prostitution would undermine Western civilization, it cannot so 17 easily be doubted that prostitution is a mode of conduct that 18 degrades people and poses a threat to family life. The legis-19 lative choice to focus on the harm posed by this particular 20 form of conduct was not unreasonable.

21 Defendants also argue that laws aimed at suppression of 22 the "world's oldest profession" will never succeed. It is true 23 that prostitution has flourished on and off for millennia. It 24 is, however, also true that the elimination of prostitution has 25 often been a mark of progressive movements in human history.
26 Besides, the failure of a law to accomplish its purpose does 27 not bring its existence into constitutional question. Murder 28 has gone on unabated since Cain, and stealing has probably never

1 been more widespread. Yet, no one would seriously argue that, 2 as a result, these laws ought to be eliminated or are constitu-3 tionally infirm.

4 The defense claims that the law is overbroad in its 5 scope by making it unlawful to engage in sex "for money or other 6 consideration." Such language could, they argue, apply to 7 social dating and even marriage itself.

8 The People correctly point out that the concept of what 9 is embedded in the word prostitution is well established in our 10 law. Prostitution means essentially indiscriminate commercial 11 sex, and not marital relations or the casual discriminate sex 12 involved in social dating.

13 A sense of human dignity is a central feature of Western 14 civilization. We have created many laws that put into effect a 15 moral code of behavior in part aimed at the creation of a social 16 order in which humanity is valued. The privacy amendment to 17 California's Constitution was not enacted by California's 18 citizens for the purpose of eliminating such laws. Although a 19 new sense of sexual freedom has been developing, and the society 20 has changed deeply, we have not yet reached a place where there 21 are left no lawful standards of decency.

22 Defendants assert that a right of privacy is invaded by 23 the engaging portion of Section 647, Subsection (b), but 24 concede that the solicitation portion of the law does not suffer 25 this infirmity. If this Court found that the Legislature could 26 not constitutionally ban engaging in an act of prostitution, 27 then, logically, the Legislature could not prohibit solicitation 28 of a lawful act.

1 The defense erroneously argues that the engaging portion 2 of the law is unconstitutional because it cannot be enforced 3 without a massive invasion of constitutional rights (e.g., by 4 illegal eavesdropping, illegal entries or spying). Many crimes 5 are successfully perpetrated in private because of the consti-6 tutional limits on the reach of government power. For example, 7 organized crime syndicates operate primarily in private. Yet 8 laws which make those conspiracies criminal are not unconstitu-9 tional, even though it might prove impossible to legally gather 10 evidence about them.

11 The demurrers are overruled.

SUPERIOR COURT NOS. CR 47640

MUNICIPAL COURT NOS. M 280968

(San Diego Judicial District)

O P I N I O N

Appeal from a judgment of conviction of the Municipal Court, San Diego Judicial District, County of San Diego, State of California.

John W. Witt, City Attorney, by Anthony J. Shanley, Deputy City Attorney, appearing for plaintiff and respondent.

Stickney, Ortlieb, Moats & Bryne, by William S. Cannon, Esq., appearing for defendant and appellant.

Appellant was convicted of a violation of Penal Code Section 647(b) (soliciting or engaging in an act of prostitution). Appellant contends that the case of Pryor v. Municipal Court, (1979) 25 Cal. 3d

1 238, and the Supreme Court's interpretation of lewd or dissolute 2 therein must apply.

3 We hold to the contrary. In Pryor, supra, the Supreme Court 4 construed Penal Code Section 647(a) only. In doing so, it construed 5 that section to prohibit only the solicitation or commission of con-6 duct in a public place or one open to the public or exposed to public 7 view, which involves the touching of the genitals, buttocks or female 8 breast, for purposes of sexual arousal, gratification, annoyance 9 or offense, by a person who knows or should know of the presence of 10 persons who may be offended by the conduct. It specifically held:

11 ". . . [W]e adopt a limited and specific 12 construction consistent with the present
13 function of Section 647, subdivision (a), 14 in the California penal statutes; We construe 15 that section to prohibit only the sollicita-16 tion or commission of conduct in a public 17 place or one open to the public or exposed 18 to public view . . . by a person who knows 19 or should know of the presence of persons 20 who may be offended by the conduct."

21 Penal Code Section 647(b) disallows solicitation or engaging in an 22 act of prostitution, which includes any lewd act between persons for 23 money or other consideration. It therefore is not limited by referenc 24 to public place or view. In Pryor the court was concerned about Penal 25 Code Section 647(a) involving speech and a chilling of the exercise 26 of the protected First Amendment rights. The court specifically limited solicitation to be that of criminal sexual conduct, and more specifically held that the section prohibited only solicitation which propose the commission of conduct itself banned by Section 647(a), i.e., lewd or dissolute conduct which occurs in a public place, etc.

1 By thus limiting the statute, the court avoided two substantial con-
2 stitutional problems, only the first of which applies to Section 3 647(b): the probably impossible task of defining with constitutional 4 specificity which forms of private lawful conduct are lewd or dis-5 solute conduct; and the First Amendment issues. By holding that the 6 terms lewd and dissolute refer to sexually motivated conduct, the 7 first constitutional problem was avoided. However, unlike Section 8 647(a), which serves the purpose of protecting onlookers who might 9 be offended by the prescribed conduct, Section 647(b) only precludes 10 solicitation of, or engaging in, a sexually motivated act (touching 11 of the genitals, buttocks, or female breast for the purpose of sexual 12 arousal or gratification for money or other consideration), and does 13 not require knowledge of the presence of persons who may be offended 14 thereby or that a public place or view be involved.

15 The judgment of conviction is upheld.

24 I disagree with the majority. While Pryor v. Municipal 25 Court, (1979) 25 Cal.3d 238, expressly applied to 647(a) only be-26 cause that was the section there involved, I think appellant is 1 correct in arguing that Pryor also applies to 647(b) as it was in-2 volved in this case. While there is a code subsection distinction 3 between the two cases, I believe it is a distinction without dif-

4 ference when we give heed to the philosophical substance of Pryor 5 and its follow-up case In re Anders, 25 Cal.3d 414 (Oct. 4, 1979).
6 The opinion in Anders, also written by Justice Tobriner, states:

7 "We construed the statute to prohibit 8 only the solicitation or commission of 9 conduct in a public place or one open to 10 the public or exposed to public view, 11 which involves the touching of the genitals, 12 buttocks, or female breast, for purposes of sexual arousal, gratification, annoyance or 13 offense, by a person who knows or should 14 know of the presence of persons who may be 15 offended by the conduct."

16 I believe this same construction for the same reasons must 17 attach to 647(b) or its meaning is lost.

18 Pryor and now Anders have pointed the law and its adminis-19 tration toward a new, more rational and reasonable result in this 20 most widely confused and applied area of the law at the point of 21 enforcement. The majority would erode the banks of the stream before 22 the law has had a chance to flow within its new bounds.

23 The conviction should be reversed.

Case No. 625374

ORDER OVERRULING DEMURRER
AND CONSTITUTIONALLY CONSTRUING STATUTE

After having considered all of the oral and written arguments presented by counsel for the respective parties—Jay M. Kohorn, for the defendant, and Byron Boeckman, Deputy City Attorney, for the People—at the hearing on the demurrer on June 6, 1980, at 1:00 p.m., in Division 104, in the above entitled case:

IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that the demurrer be and the same hereby is overruled based upon the fact that Penal Code Section 647, subdivision (b) is not unconstitutional as interpreted herein. The term "lewd" must be defined as the Supreme Court defined that term in the case of Pryor v. Municipal Court¹ which case constitutionally construed Penal Code Section 647, subdivision (a): the term "lewd" refers to conduct "which involves the touching of the genitals, buttocks, or female breast for the purpose of sexual arousal, gratification, annoyance or offense, if the actor knows or should know of the presence of persons who may be offended by his conduct."

Thus, P.C. section 647(b) would conform to the general scheme of the entire Disorderly Conduct statute (P.C. section 647) in that public offensiveness would be required. The statute would thus also conform to the requirement that the same word used throughout the section be defined in the same manner, regardless of which subdivision it appears in, throughout section 647, in order to give reasonable notice to the public as to what conduct is proscribed by the statute.

This order shall constitute the Law of the case.

4 This brief takes as its starting point the proposition put forward twenty-5 two years ago by the British Committee on Homosexual Offenses and Prostitution in 6 answer to the question, "What acts ought to be punished by the State?" That Commit-7 tee, under the chairmanship of Sir John Wolfenden, concluded that "the function of 8 the criminal law" in matters of sexual conduct "is to preserve public order and 9 decency, to protect the citizen from what is offensive or injurious, and to provide 10 sufficient safeguards against exploitation and corruption of others, particularly those 11 who are specially vulnerable because they are young, weak in body or mind, inexpe-12 rienced, or in a state of special physical, official or economic dependence."^{1/} Ordinarily 13 questions such as "What acts ought to be punished by the State?" are addressed 14 to legislatures, and, in the case of the Report of the Wolfenden Committee, that 15 question was addressed to Parliament. But the existence of written constitutions in 16 the United States -- both Federal and state -- and the requirement that all laws be 17 in conformity with those constitutions mean that, in this country, questions such as 18 the one just posed must frequently be addressed to the judiciary as well as to the 19 legislature. Accordingly, much of what follows will be devoted to a discussion of 20 the scope of one of California's prostitution laws, i.e., Section 647(b) of the California 21 Penal Code. And, for this purpose, it becomes necessary to begin by tracing briefly 22 the historical background leading to the enactment of Section 647(b) in its present 23 form.

Regulation in England

3 It comes as no surprise to learn that the early Church fathers — consistent 4 with their view that the only licit form of sexual relations was that which is performed 5 within the state of marriage, and, even then only that which could lead to reproduction 6 — severely condemned prostitution, which, like all other forms of extra-marital sex, 7 was considered shameful and grossly immoral. What may surprise many persons, 8 however, is to learn that St. Augustine and St. Thomas Aquinas both held that prosti-9 tution should be legally tolerated for the reason that it was considered to be a 10 protection to the marriage state. Through the availability of prostitution, they 11 argued, married or single men would not be tempted to seduce other men's wives or 12 to have sexual relations with virgins who were potential brides.^{2/} This view pervaded 13 medieval thinking on the subject, with the result that prostitution was tolerated 14 throughout the medieval period.

15 This rationale is most appropriately considered today in the context of 16 relationships in which sexual activity is impossible for one of the parties and yet 17 there is sufficient non-sexual substance to justify maintaining the relationship.
18 For example, if because of disease, illness, or physical incapacity created by war or, 19 perhaps, an automobile accident, a person is precluded from having sex in any form 20 with his or her spouse, paying consideration makes it possible for the other spouse 21 to satisfy the fundamental sex drive without threatening the relationship by establishing 22 emotional ties to others on this level. The reasons for maintaining such a non-

23 ^{2/} Referring to prostitutes, St. Augustin wrote: "What can be . . . more 24 sordid, more bereft of decency or more full of turpitude than prostitutes, procurers, 25 and the other pests of that sort? [Yet] remove prostitutes from human affairs, and 26 you will unsettle everything on account of lusts"; that is, you will defile everything 27 with lust. (St. Augustine, De Ordine, translated by Robert F. Russel (New York, 28 N.Y., Cosmopolitan Science & Arts Service Co., 1942), Book II, chap. IV, sec. 12, 29 p.95)

28 It must be remembered that, in the eyes of the Church, there was little 29 if any difference between prostitution, fornication, and adultery. All stood equally 30 condemned because they involved extra-marital sex and were likely to involve non-31 procreative sexual relations as well. As Aquinas stated, "[M]atrimony is natural for 32 men, and promiscuous performance of the sexual act, outside matrimony, is contrary 33 to man's good. For this reason, it must be a sin." Aquinas then points out that it 34 cannot "be deemed a slight sin for a man to arrange for the emission of semen 35 apart from the proper purpose of generating . . . children" because "the inordinate 36 emission of semen is incompatible with the natural good; namely, the preservation of the species." He concludes, therefore, that "after the sin of homicide . . . , this type of sin appears to take next place." Thus fornication and, by extension, prostitution are second only to murder in their sinfulness. (Thomas Aquinas, On the Truth of the Catholic Faith: Summa contra Gentiles, — translated by Vernon J. Bourke (Garden City, New York, 1956), Book III, Part 2, chap. 122(8), (9) & (11), p. 146)

1 sexual relationship with an incapacitated spouse might include children, loving com-2 panionship, or religious conviction.

3 The toleration of the Middle Ages ended with the Protestant Reformation.
4 Luther and Calvin regarded prostitution with abhorrence and those who engaged in it 5 as the worst of sinners, not because there was something inherently evil about sex 6 for consideration, but because morally all sexual activity outside of marriage was 7 intolerable.^{3/} Both of them urged its legal suppression. This position was even 8 more strongly held by the Puritan elements within Calvinism, elements which deeply 9 influenced the sexual attitudes of both England and her colonies. These Puritan 10 attitudes found their most congenial home in the English colonies in the New World, 11 which began their existence often in an atmosphere of severe religious dogmatism.
12 If the United States were, in fact, like Iran, a theocracy, without a First Amendment 13 freedom of choice in religious moral matters and without a doctrine of Separation of 14 Church and State, these anti-prostitution, anti-fornication rationales still might be 15 considered meritorious, and the punishment might be death.

16 In England itself, however, the common law has never known the crime of 17 prostitution; until the Reformation, all sexual crimes except rape — such as bigamy, 18 incest, sodomy, adultery, and fornication — were ecclesiastical offenses, cognizable 19 only in the courts Christian.^{4/} After the Reformation, most — but not all — of 20 these offenses were secularized and subsumed under the royal jurisdiction. Fornication, 21 however, never became a secular offense, and, since there never had been a specific 22 ecclesiastical crime of prostitution distinct from fornication, no secular crime of 23 prostitution was ever created.

24
25 ^{3/} Luther actually wrote little about prostitution as distinct from fornication 26 and other forms of extra-marital sexual relations, against which he inveighed in the 27 strongest terms. Like the medieval Church before him, he held that the gravamen 28 of the offence was that sexual relations took place outside of marriage, not that 29 they were paid for. One of his continuing charges against the Roman Church was 30 what he considered to be its easy-going attitude toward extra-marital sexual relations.
31 Thus, for example, he stated that a man

32 may have had vile commerce with six hundred prostitutes and seduced 33 countless matrons and virgins, and kept many mistresses, yet nothing of 34 this would be an impediment, and prevent his becoming a bishop, or a 35 cardinal, or a pope. (John Dillenberger, ed., Martin Luther: Selections 36 from his Writings (Garden City, New York, 1961), p. 347.)

37 ^{4/} This did not mean, however, that there were no secular efforts at 38 prohibiting or controlling what amounted to prostitution in England during medieval 39 times. Maitland states from information in the Pipe Rolls that "London citizens 40 used to arrest fornicating chaplains and put them in the Tun [presumably a gaol] as 41 night-walkers; in 1297 the bishop objected and the practice was forbidden. At a

1 This is reflected in English law today, which was perhaps best summarized 2 by the Wolfenden Committee in 1957 in the course of explaining the contemporary 3 English attitude toward prostitution. The Committee stated:

4 Prostitution in itself is not, in this country, an offense against 5 the criminal law. Some of the activities of prostitutes are, and so are 6 the activities of some others who are concerned in the activities of prosti-7 tutes. But it is not illegal for a woman to "offer her body to indiscriminate 8 lewdness for hire," provided that she does not, in the course of doing so, 9 commit any one of the specific acts which would bring her within the 10 ambit of the law. Nor, it seems to us, can any case be sustained for 11 attempting to make prostitution in itself illegal

12 Prostitution is a social fact deplorable in the eyes of moralists, 13 sociologists and, we believe, the great majority of ordinary people. But 14 it has persisted in many civilizations throughout many centuries, and the 15 failure of attempts to stamp it out by repressive legislation shows that it 16 cannot be eradicated through the agency of the criminal law

17 It follows that there are limits to the degree of discouragement 18 which the criminal law can properly exercise towards a woman who has 19 deliberately decided to live her life in this way, or a man who has deliber-20 ately chosen to use her services. The criminal law, as the Street Offenses 21 Committee finally pointed out, "is not concerned with private morals or 22 with ethical sanctions."^{5/}

25
26 later time severe by-laws were made for the punishment of prostitutes, bawds, adulterers 27 and priests found with women." (Sir Frederick Pollock & Frederic W. Maitland, The 28 History of English Law (Cambridge, England, 1928), Vol. II, p. 543, note 5, citing 29 Munimenta Gildallae Rolls Series, containing Liber Albus & Liber Custumarum, respec-30 tively Vol. II, p. 213 & Vol. I pp. 457-459.) These and other fleeting glimpses of medieval social history would appear to indicate that the main thrust was the suppression of sexual promiscuity in general rather than prostitution in particular.

31 ^{5/} Wolfenden Report, op. cit., pp. 79-80. The absence of any specific 32 crime of prostitution at common law did not always mean that conduct which amounted 33 to prostitution was not penalized under other statutes, such as those against vagrancy.
34 For example, at the very beginning of the Reformation, under Elizabeth, "an armed 35 company, headed by gentlemen, attacked Bridewell [Prison]. Seeing that their object 36 was the release of certain unrepentant women whose profession concerned the gentlemen only, it is probable that the whole of the rioters were gentlemen." (Sir Walter Besant, London in the Time of the Tudors, (London, 1904), p. 387.)

1 Thus, still today, prostitution itself is not a crime in England. Likewise, 2 sexual solicitations, even for prostitution, in other than public places, are not made 3 criminal. However, there exists in England a veritable mountain of statutes prohibiting 4 certain aspects of prostitution, a mass of laws which covers a huge legal patchwork.
5 At least twenty such enactments are referred to in the footnotes of the Wolfenden
6 Report, reflecting a time span of more than six centuries, extending from the Justices 7 of the Peace Act of 1361 to the England and Wales: Sexual Offenses Act of 1956, 8 passed only the year before the appearance of the Wolfenden Committee's Report.
9 All these laws continue to be employed in the enforcement of the penal sanctions 10 against these aspects of prostitution.^{6/} Despite this jumble, it is possible to place 11 all these laws under one of the following four well-defined heads. (In each instance, 12 the conduct listed below constitutes a criminal offense.):

- 13 1. Loitering or soliciting by any common prostitute or night-walker in 14 any public place for the purpose of prostitution.^{7/}
- 15 2. Living on the earnings of prostitution.^{8/}
- 16 3. Procuration, i.e., procuring a woman for the purpose of prostitution.^{9/}
- 17 4. Maintaining a brothel.^{10/}

18 The gist of the first category of offenses remains primarily the act of 19 thrusting unwanted sexual behavior or solicitation upon unwilling viewers or listeners.

28 ^{6/} See Wolfenden Report, pp. 82-114 and notes, passim. One of the 29 reasons for the multiplicity of statutes is the English practice of legislating separately 30 for England, Wales, Scotland, and Northern Ireland, as well as for particular cities.
31 Thus some of the laws on the subject apply only to England and Wales, other to Scotland, some only to greater London, and others again only to burgh police outside of greater London.

International Status of Prostitution Laws

Except for those American jurisdictions which, like California, punish prostitution itself, the prostitution laws of no modern state go beyond the four general areas just listed. Some countries' penal codes, in fact, do not cover all four categories. Much of this, particularly in continental Europe, is due to the wide influence of the Code Napoleon. The French Penal Code punishes: (1) pimping; (2) participating in "the profits of prostitution of others;" (3) living on the earnings of an "habitual prostitute;" (4) inducing someone to become a prostitute; and (5) acting "as an intermediary . . . between persons practicing prostitution."^{11/} It also punishes anyone who "maintains a house of prostitution."^{12/} Like a number of others, the French Code does not punish soliciting for purposes of prostitution. The German Penal Code, on the other hand, punishes sexual solicitations of all kinds, whether for prostitution or for non-commercial purposes, if done "publicly, in an ostentatious manner, or in a manner likely to disturb the community or other individuals."^{13/} It also punishes anyone who, acting "for gain," aids "or abets the commission of lewd acts by others by acting as intermediary or by affording or providing the opportunity therefore [pandering]" as well as anyone "who maintains or conducts a bordello."^{14/} Finally, it punishes any male who derives "his livelihood" from prostitution or who "for gain . . . promotes . . . prostitution."^{15/} Austria, under the rubric of "pandering," punishes those "who provide prostitutes with regular lodging," or "who make a business of procuring" prostitutes, or who "permit themselves to be intermediators in illicit undertakings of this nature."^{16/} Like the French Code, the Austrian does not proscribe soliciting for purposes of prostitution. The Greek Code punishes anyone "who, as his

1 profession, and for financial gain, induces females to commit prostitution" as well as 2 any "male person who derives his livelihood wholly or partially from the exploitation 3 of the income of a female prostitute."^{17/} The Norwegian Code appears to be one 4 of the most liberal. A provision similar to those which prohibit "procuring" in other 5 jurisdictions punishes "anybody who misleads another to make a living by prostitution, 6 or who is accessory to such misleading."^{18/} Another section punishes "anybody who 7 furthers the indecent relations of others out of greed or who exploits such relations 8 out of greed."^{19/} Finally, in a surprising provision, the same code punishes "anybody 9 who tries to restrain a person living by prostitution from ceasing therewith, or is 10 accessory thereto."^{20/}

11 As one moves away from Europe, one finds the criminal sanctions involving 12 some aspects of prostitution to be fewer and less comprehensive. Thus Japan, in A 13 Preparatory Draft for the Revised Penal Code, planned to punish only "pandering," 14 which it defined as conduct whereby anyone "for purposes of gain induces a woman 15 not of a promiscuous character to have sexual intercourse."^{21/} An almost identical 16 provision, also denominated "pandering," comprises the sole provision on the subject 17 of prostitution in the Korean Penal Code.^{22/} In Argentina it appears that the only 18 crime is promoting prostitution in instances where "the victim" is under twenty-two 19 years of age, unless the "perpetrator is an ascendant, husband, brother, tutor or 20 person entrusted with the education or care of the victim," in which case the age of 21 the victim is of no consequence.^{23/} The Turkish Code is similar. Procuring for

1 purposes of prostitution is ordinarily a crime only when the girl is a virgin or is 2 under the age of twenty-one.^{24/} However, if the woman is "enticed into prostitution, 3 by her husband, ascendant, ascendant by affinity, brother or sister," her age is no 4 longer a factor, and it is a crime even if the woman has reached her majority.^{25/}

5 In Canada prostitution is not, in itself, criminal. Procuring, keeping a 6 bawdy house, and certain forms of public solicitation are punishable offenses.^{26/} The 7 statute regulating public solicitation reads "Every person who solicits in a public 8 place for the purpose of prostitution is guilty of an offense punishable on summary 9 conviction."^{27/} With respect to the definition and scope of public solicitation, the 10 Canadian courts have held that (1) an undercover police officer's car, where the 11 soliciting allegedly took place, was not a "public place" within the meaning of this 12 section, and (2) to constitute this offense there must not only be a demonstration by 13 the accused of an intention to make herself available for prostitution, but conduct 14 which is pressing or persistent.^{28/}

15 One could go on, but to do so would merely pile Pelion on Ossa. the 16 same would be true if one were to list those countries, such as Italy, which appear 17 to have no criminal sanctions against any aspects of prostitution. The only purpose 18 of this excursus into the laws of foreign countries has been to show which aspects 19 of prostitution are deemed appropriate objects of legal proscription in the eyes of 20 most of the world. There seem to be two common threads running through all of 21 these foreign laws. One is that, although they punish some of the several aspects 22 of prostitution, the conduct itself remains legal. The other is that they do not 23 punish discrete solicitation in private.

Prohibition in American Jurisdictions

3 The system of punishing some aspects of prostitution, while not punishing 4 private sexual conduct for a fee or discreet solicitations in private situations, is 5 followed by some — though not a majority—of American jurisdictions. Most American 6 states make prostitution itself a crime along with its ancillary aspects.

7 Why do most jurisdictions in this country prohibit sexual relations in 8 private merely because a fee is involved? Why are private and discreet solicitations 9 to commit such conduct made criminal?

10 The answer might lie in the fact that, as in early Christian times, the 11 offense of prostitution is not seen today as morally distinct from other forms of 12 sexual conduct which do not lead to procreation within a marriage. At least some 13 forms of consenting adult private sexual activity not involving consideration are 14 still made criminal by over half of the fifty states. In some cases the laws apply 15 equally to married and unmarried couples. The rationales given by state appellate 16 courts for condoning such statutes often involve religious doctrines, and judicial 17 opinions often include quotes from the Bible. The issue is a question of morals, 18 and, specifically, whether sex for purely recreational purposes is morally corrupt.
19 This brief, in part, explores the present criminal sanctions against prostitution in 20 California in light of some major changes of circumstances in the state and in the 21 country, especially the recent legalization of all forms of consenting adult private 22 sex in California and, in some other states, the growth of the constitutional right to 23 privacy, a new look into what constitutes a valid state interest, and the extent to 24 which the state may intrude into the perogatives of the individual based upon a 25 concept of morals as opposed to a concept of "harms."

26 The drafters of the Hawaii Penal code, as revised in 1972, suggest public 27 pressure as their reason for not overturning section 712-1200 of that code which prohibits 28 soliciting or engaging in sexual intercourse for a fee:

29 History has proven that prostitution is not going to be abolished 30 either by penal legislation nor the imposition of criminal sanctions through 31 the vigorous enforcement of such legislation. Yet the trend of modern 32 thought on prostitution in this country is that "public policy" demands 33 that the criminal law go on record against prostitution. Defining this 34 "public policy" is a difficult task. Perhaps it more correctly ought to be 35 considered and termed "public demand" — a widespread community attitude 36 which the penal law must take into account regardless of the questionable

1 rationales upon which it is based.

2 A number of reasons have been advanced for the suppression of 3 prostitution, the most often repeated of which are: "the prevention of 4 disease, the protection of innocent girls from exploitation, and the danger 5 that more sinister activities may be financed by the gains from prostitution." 6 These reasons are not convincing. Venereal disease is not prevented by 7 laws attempting to suppress prostitution. If exploitation were a significant 8 factor, the offense could be dealt with solely in terms of coercion. Legalizing 9 prostitution would decrease the prostitute's dependence upon and connection 10 with the criminal underworld and might decrease the danger that "organized 11 crime" might be financed in part by criminally controlled prostitution.

12 Our study of public attitude in this area revealed the widespread 13 belief among those interviewed that prostitution should be suppressed 14 entirely or that it should be so restricted as not to offend those members 15 of society who do not wish to consort with prostitutes or to be affronted 16 by them. Making prostitution a criminal offense is one method of controlling 17 the scope of prostitution and thereby protecting those segments of society 18 which are offended by its open existence. This "abolitionist" approach is 19 not without its vociferous detractors. There are those that contend that 20 the only honest and workable approach to the problem is to legalize 21 prostitution and confine it to certain localities within a given community.
22 While such a proposal may exhibit foresight and practicality, the fact 23 remains that a large segment of society is not presently willing to accept 24 such a liberal approach. Recognizing this fact and the need for public 25 order, the Code makes prostitution and its associate enterprises criminal 26 offenses.

27 Hence, the drafters of the Hawaii Code noted clearly the reliance by 28 Hawaii's legislature on the moral view of the majority over a concept of clearly 29 articulable harms to individuals or society. This brief shall highlight the growing 30 view that it is unconscionable in a free society for the state to criminally punish 31 activity based upon some concept of morals; only conduct which results in a demonstrable 32 harm may be proscribed under this view.

33 Most of the legal distinctions between the states in the area of prostitution 34 do not revolve around the question whether or not they prohibit prostitution itself 35 but how they define the term. Most states define "prostitution" as consisting of 36 sexual relations "for hire" or "for a fee." Sometimes variant language is employed,

1 but with essentially the same meaning. New Jersey, for example, punishes any 2 person who "is an inmate of a house of prostitution or otherwise engages in sexual 3 activity as a business." (Emphasis added.) Soliciting for purposes of prostitution is 4 defined as soliciting "another person in or within view of any public place for the 5 purpose of being hired to engage in sexual activity."^{29/}

6 California's definition of prostitution is in sharp contrast to the above.
7 Section 647(b) of its Penal Code defines prostitution so as to include "any lewd act 8 between persons for money or other consideration." Aside from the fact that no 9 other state appears to use the word "consideration" in its definition of prostitution, 10 this all-embracing language seems startling in light of the historical and traditional 11 concepts of prostitution discussed above. As Professor David Richards has pointed 12 out in his magisterial article on the subject, "The traditional concern for prostitution 13 was peculiarly associated with female sexuality — more particularly, with attitudes 14 toward promiscuous unchastity in women — apart from the commercial aspects."^{30/} 15 The Model Penal Code refers to "16 states whose statutes define prostitution to 16 include promiscuous intercourse without hire."^{31/} (Emphasis added) By contrast, 17 Section 647(b) makes money or consideration the determining element in its definition 18 of prostitution, and therefore the determinant of criminality. The provision is not 19 only at odds with the traditional concepts of prostitution — its criminal reach extending 20 beyond that found in all other American jurisdictions except Missouri — but also the 21 statute is inconsistent with California's forward and enlightened approach which 22 promotes individual moral and personal decisions regarding sexual subjects absent 23 some harm to others.^{32/}

24 Thus, in the area of prostitution, the state has become moralist, choosing 25 the moral code of a segment, albeit possibly a majority, of the population, and 26 imposing it upon all, with criminal sanction for disobedience. The issue squarely 27 before the court is the extent to which the state may play this role, depriving the 28 individual of freedom of choice in areas in which no demonstrable harm to others 29 can be found. Under many forms of government, this is no issue at all; it is a 30 tribute to our very political foundations that we are debating this issue through the 31 public forum of the courts.

STATUTORY REGULATION OF PROSTITUTION IN CALIFORNIA

Until 1961 California did not criminalize private sexual conduct performed for money or other consideration. Neither did it prohibit the solicitation of such conduct.

However, early in California history a multitude of statutes was enacted to regulate and prohibit many practices associated with the business of prostitution. These acts remain in full force and effect at the present time and should not be affected by decriminalization of prostitution itself:

Section 266:	Enticement of unmarried female under 18 for prostitution;
Section 266a:	Abduction by fraudulent inducement;
Section 266b:	Abduction to live in illicit relationship;
Section 266d:	Receiving money for placing person in custody for purposes of cohabitation;
Section 266f:	Sale of person for immoral purposes;
Section 266g:	Placing wife in house of prostitution;
Section 266h:	Pimping;
Section 266i:	Pandering;
Section 267:	Abduction of person under 18 for prostitution;
Section 309:	Admitting or keeping minors in a house of ill fame;
Section 315:	Keeping or residing in a house of ill fame;
Section 316:	Keeping a disorderly house which disturbs the peace;
Section 318:	Prevailing upon person to visit a house of prostitution;
Sections 11225-35:	Red Light Abatement Act, regulating public or private nuisances.

This brief is not concerned with these statutes or their constitutionality. The focus here is only on the scope and constitutionality of Section 647, subdivision (b) of the Penal Code, which prohibits soliciting or engaging in acts of prostitution. It is first appropriate to review the statutory history and judicial interpretation of this statute before addressing the constitutional and policy considerations which are the primary focus of this brief.

LEGISLATIVE HISTORY AND JUDICIAL INTERPRETATION OF SECTION 647(b)
AS IT PERTAINS TO PROSTITUTION

The Pre-1961 Statute and Its Construction

In addition to the numerous statutes which were enacted by the California Legislature to regulate the business of prostitution and many of the evils which had been historically associated with it, Section 647, subdivision (10) punished as a vagrant anyone who was considered a "common prostitute." This statute was first enacted in the general penal code revision of 1872 and was based upon a similar statute enacted in 1855.^{33/} The statute remained basically unchanged until 1961.

Thus, between 1855 and 1961, engaging in sexual relations for a fee and soliciting for such conduct were not made criminal by California law. Status was penalized, not conduct. Pimping (266h), pandering (266i), keeping a house of ill fame (315), and being a "common prostitute" (647, sub. 10) were crimes.

Since Section 647(10) is the predecessor of Section 647(b), we now examine the scope and definitions given to the former statute by the California appellate courts. The Legislature did not define the term "prostitution" or the term "prostitute" as used in Section 647(10) or in statutes regulating other aspects of prostitution; it merely relied on judicial interpretations of these terms.

There is only one reported appellate decision reviewing a conviction under the pre-1961 statute. The court in People v. Brandt (1956) 306 P.2d 1069, at 1070, interpreted Section 647(10) and stated:

Obviously a male cannot be a prostitute and hence is not subject prosecution under subdivision (10) of this section. Am.Jur., Vol.42, page 260; 8 Words and Phrases, Common Prostitute, page 166; Ferguson v. Superior Court 26 Cal.App. 554, 147 P. 603; In re Carey 57 Cal.App. 297, 304, 207 P. 271.

This holding is buttressed by other California appellate decisions interpreting the meaning of "prostitution" as used in the pimping and pandering statutes. In the context of these statutes California courts had consistently defined "prostitution" as the "common, indiscriminate, illicit intercourse of a woman for hire." Ferguson v. Superior Court (1915) 26 Cal.App. 554; People v. Marron (1934) 140 Cal.App. 432;

2 The 1961 Statute and Its Construction

3 The first reported legislative proposal for change of Section 647 came 4 after a hearing of a subcommittee of the Assembly Interim Committee on Judiciary 5 which met in San Francisco in July of 1958.^{34/} There were numerous protests against 6 alleged repressive police practices and, as a result, Section 647 became a subject of 7 legislative inquiry. One issue which was discussed concerned the adoption of a state 8 policy to punish persons for their acts and not their status. The following year 9 Assembly Bill 2712 was introduced to revise Section 647. The subdivision dealing 10 with prostitution would have punished every person who "For pecuniary profit, solicits 11 or engages in any act of prostitution."^{35/} Most other subdivisions of Section 647 12 would also have been revised. The bill passed the Legislature but it was vetoed by 13 the Governor for reasons unconnected with the issue of prostitution.

14 In 1960 the California Supreme Court reviewed a portion of Section 647 15 which punished as a vagrant anyone who was a "common drunkard." The Court held 16 that where the entire meaning of the subdivision centered on the words "common 17 drunkard," the subdivision was unconstitutionally vague in violation of both state and 18 Federal constitutions. In re Newbern (1960) 53 Cal.2d 786. This decision gave added 19 impetus for the movement for legislative revision of Section 647 and another bill 20 was introduced in 1960 to revise this statute and its subdivisions.

21 Professor Arthur H. Sherry, the person primarily responsible for drafting 22 the revisions of Section 647 which were finally passed by the Legislature in 1960 23 (effective in 1961) suggested a slight modification of Assembly Bill 2712. In his 24 scholarly article on the subject of vagrancy statutes, he wrote, "This is a simple 25 description of the conduct to be proscribed. It was drafted before the decision in 26 the Newbern case which has, by necessary implication, deleted the term 'common 27 prostitutes' from the list of those who are vagrants. The qualification 'for pecuniary 28 profit' added by the Assembly Bill seems unnecessary," adding in a footnote, "[B]y 29 definition, a prostitute is one who engages in sexual intercourse for hire. People v.
30 Head (1956) 146 Cal.App.2d 744, 304 P.2d 761."^{36/} Other than the fact that the Newbern 31 case mandated some sort of legislative revision and that policy considerations necessitate 32 punishing conduct rather than status, the only reason given by Sherry for the regulation

34 ^{34/} Id., at 567

35 ^{35/} Id., at 568

36 ^{36/} Id., at 570

1 of prostitution was that "the pimp, the panderer and the prostitute cannot be permitted 2 to flaunt their services at large."^{37/} Again, the implication is some sort of "thrusting" 3 of conduct on an unwilling public.

4 The Assembly Interim Committee on Criminal Procedure expressly stated 5 it was adopting the definition of the term "prostitution" found in People v. Head, 6 supra. That Committee approved Sherry's revision and quoted his comments with 7 full concurrence.^{38/}

8 Therefore, as it became law in 1961, Section 647, subdivision (b) made 9 subject to criminal penalties every person who "solicits or who engages in any act of 10 prostitution."

11 Who was subject to prosecution under this new prohibition? The Legislature 12 used the phrase "Every person who commits any of the following acts" before describing 13 the speech and conduct prohibited. Should this be read literally or did there exist 14 exceptions? What conduct was unlawful to engage in or solicit under this subdivision?
15 With respect to the latter question the Legislature answered it by adopting the 16 definition of "prostitution" as found in People v. Head, supra. The prohibited conduct 17 was "common, indiscriminate, illicit intercourse of a woman for hire." See also People 18 v. Frey (1964) 228 Cal.App.2d 33. As to the former question, "who was subject to 19 prosecution," a recent pronouncement from a California appellate court is of assistance.
20 "The words, 'every person' . . . who solicits . . . any act of prostitution,' are clear 21 and unambiguous. 'Every,' means 'each and all within the range of contemplated 22 possibilities.' (Webster's New International Dictionary; 3rd ed. 1961; Unabridged, p.
23 788.)"^{39/} The court held that "all persons" who solicit an act of prostitution are 24 guilty. This applies to customers as well as prostitutes.^{40/}

25 Thus, the 1961 statute, as interpreted by the courts, proscribed solicitation 26 or engaging in common and indiscriminate heterosexual intercourse for a fee, without 27 regard to whether the solicitation was made by a man or a woman, a customer or a 28 prostitute.

1 III(b)

2 The 1965 Amendment

3 In 1965 the Legislature amended Section 647(b). The wording of the 1961 4 enactment was not repealed; instead, the Legislature expanded the definition of 5 prostitution to give the police a tool to deal with the "homosexual problem." Homosexual 6 acts per se were, at the time, illegal. Whereas the 1961 enactment incorporated the 7 definition of prostitution found in People v. Head, supra, which was limited to sexual 8 intercourse between a man and a woman, this obviously could not be used to prosecute 9 homosexual sex for hire. Therefore, the Legislature added a second sentence to 10 subdivision (b) which read:

11 As used in this subdivision, "prostitution" includes any lewd act 12 between persons of the same sex for money or other consideration.^{41/}

13 This amendment created three changes in the prostitution law. First, it 14 expanded the definition of prostitution to include homosexual acts. Second, it enlarged 15 the ambit of the law to prohibit lewd acts rather than its previous and more narrow 16 criminalization of sexual intercourse for hire. Finally, instead of penalizing the 17 sexual conduct or solicitation if it were "for hire," the amendment enlarged the 18 category of acts proscribed to include all such acts "for money or other consideration."

19 Since the primary purpose of the 1965 amendment was to bring homosexual 20 acts within the reach of the prostitution law, the rationale for the first change, i.e., 21 adding "of the same sex," is obvious. Also, since persons of the same sex are 22 incapable of engaging in traditional sexual intercourse with each other, i.e., insertion 23 of the penis into the vagina, some additional language was needed to define the 24 prohibited homosexual conduct. The term "lewd" as used in Sections 647(a) and 25 647(d) was a possible answer, since those statutes were successfully being used by 26 law enforcement primarily to arrest homosexuals for noncommercial sex. This term 27 "lewd" was also expansive enough to allow for great police and prosecutorial discretion 28 and to include a wide variety of sexual conduct without necessitating the Legislature's 29 use of embarrassingly explicit language. With respect to the third change, the only 30 plausible rationale for defining the pecuniary aspect as "money or other consideration" 31 is that the Legislature wanted no "loopholes" in the law. If the consideration for 32 the sexual conduct was something of value other than cash, this too was to be 33 prohibited.

The 1969 Amendment and Present Wording

In 1969 the Legislature again amended Section 647(b). This amendment deleted from the second sentence of the subdivision the words "of the same sex." There have been no other amendments to the statute, so that the section presently reads:

Every person who commits any of the following acts is guilty of disorderly conduct, a misdemeanor: (b) Who solicits or engages in any act of prostitution. As used in this subdivision, "prostitution" includes any lewd act between persons for money or other consideration.

In neither the 1965 amendment nor the 1969 amendment did the Legislature define the phrase "any lewd act," thus leaving the extent of the proscription vague and open to individual interpretation and ultimately to limitation by the courts.

Although the Legislative history does not appear to indicate the reason for the 1969 amendment, one logical explanation can be found. This amendment further expands the proscription to make possible prosecutions of heterosexual — as well as homosexual — "lewd acts." Previously, because the 1961 amendment incorporated the definition of prostitution from People v. Head, supra, the only prohibited conduct was heterosexual intercourse for hire. Homosexual lewd acts were included by the 1965 version of the law. Finally, in 1969, all lewd acts for money or other consideration are prohibited.

The expanded definition of "prostitution" was not discussed by California appellate courts until 1976. In a case involving a conviction under the pandering statute (Penal Code Section 266i prohibits procuring another person for the purpose of prostitution or encouraging another to become a prostitute), the court held that:

Prostitution is defined as "Common lewdness of a woman for gain" (Black's Law Dictionary (4th ed.)), "act or practice of engaging in sexual intercourse for money." (Random House Dictionary of the English Language (Unabridged Ed.)), or ". . . any lewd act between persons for money or other consideration." (Pen.Code, Section 647(b).) People v. Fixler (1976, 56 Cal.App.3d 321, 325.

The Fixler case indicates that sexual intercourse for money is prostitution, regardless of the motivation of the participants to the sexual act:

There can be no question but that Patricia engaged in lewd acts and sexual intercourse for money and that defendants, by providing the money and directing her performances, procured, caused and induced her to do

1 so. (Citations) There is nothing in statute or case law which would 2 remove this conduct from the ambit of the statute (Pen.Code, Section 3 266i) simply because the money was provided by nonparticipants in the 4 sexual activity or because defendant's primary motivation was to photograph 5 the activity.

6 It seems self-evident that if A pays B to engage in sexual intercourse 7 with C, then B is engaging in prostitution and that situation is not changed 8 by the fact that A may stand to observe the act or photograph it. Fixler, 9 supra, at 325.

10 That same year another appellate court in California affirmed the principle 11 that the prostitution statute covers both men and women whether customer or prostitute.
12 "Penal Code Section 647, subdivision (b), is clearly designed to punish specific acts 13 without reference to the status of the perpetrator." Leffel v. Municipal Court (1976) 14 54 Cal.App.3d 569, 573, at 575. The use of the term "every person" in the prostitution 15 statute is to be read literally and means "each and all within the range of contemplated 16 possibilities." Leffel, supra, at 576.

17 This broad interpretation of the term "prostitution" was accepted by yet 18 another appellate court some two years later:

19 For the purpose of defining the charged offenses of pimping and 20 pandering the court defined [the term "prostitution" as] "soliciting another 21 person to engage in or engaging in sexual intercourse or other lewd or 22 dissolute acts between persons for money or other considerations." The 23 defense theory is that the statutes condemning pimping and pandering 24 should be taken as implying a definition of the term "prostitution" which 25 imports sexual intercourse for hire and does not include other forms of 26 commercial sex acts. This contention cannot be sustained. The definition 27 used by the court was properly taken from Penal Code Section 647(b) 28 which defines prostitution as including "any lewd act between persons for 29 money or other consideration." People v. Grow (1978) 84 Cal.App.3d 310, 30 313.

31 The definition of prostitution was again the subject of judicial review in 32 1977. In a case involving the propriety of using the Red Light Abatement Law to 33 close a building as a nuisance, the court held that sexual intercourse for hire by 34 models whose activity is photographed for a non-obscene publication is "prostitution."
35 People ex rel. Van De Kamp v. American Art Enterprises (1977) 75 Cal.App.3d 523, 36 529.

2 Norris (1978) 152 Cal.Rptr. 134. In that case the defendant was convicted of soliciting 3 an undercover vice officer to engage in an act of prostitution. While seated in the 4 officer's automobile, the defendant solicited the officer to engage in an act of oral 5 copulation for $15.00. The location where the act was intended to occur was left 6 unspecified by the defendant. Several issues were raised and addressed on appeal.
7 Defendant complained that the trial court had misinstructed the jury on the required 8 criminal intent under the solicitation portion of the statute. He argued that soliciting 9 for prostitution is a specific intent crime. The appellate court agreed. It held that 10 engaging in prostitution is a general intent crime and the only intent which must be 11 proved is the intent to commit the prohibited conduct. However, the soliciting portion 12 of the statute is a specific intent crime, i.e., the requisite intent is to engage in 13 the crime of prostitution. The court held that the purpose of the solicitation portion 14 of the statute is to prevent the solicitation of crime. Defendant Norris also complained 15 about the jury instructions defining "prostitution." One instruction, CALJIC 16.420, 16 reads as follows:

17 Every person who solicits another to engage in . . . [sexual intercourse 18 for money or other consideration] [or] [any lewd act between persons 19 of the same or different sexes for money or other consideration], is 20 guilty of a misdemeanor.

21 Another instruction, CALJIC 16.402, defined the term "lewd" as follows:

22 As used in the foregoing instruction, the word . . . "lewd" . . .
23 mean[s] lustful, lascivious, unchaste, wanton, or loose in morals and conduct.

24 The appellate court found these to be proper instructions, relying on the 25 authority of People v. Williams (1976) 59 Cal.App.3d 225, 229. The Williams Court 26 had authorized such an instruction on the definition of "lewd" as used in Section 27 647, subdivision (a).

28 Defendant Norris also claimed that the trial court should have acquitted 29 him because there was no proof that the act of oral copulation was to be performed 30 in a public place. He argued that in addition to the element of money or other 31 consideration, the sexual act solicited must be "lewd." Private sexual conduct between 32 consenting adults is no longer a crime in California and therefore such acts may not 33 be considered "lewd" unless they are performed in public he claimed. Relying on 34 Silva v. Municipal Court (1974) 40 Cal.App.3d 733, 735-736, the court held that a 35 solicited act may be considered lewd regardless of where it is to be performed. In 36 Silva, the solicitation portion of Section 647, subdivision (a), had been challenged; Silva

1 was decided before the passage of the Consenting Adults Act in 1976.

2 The most recent California appellate case dealing with the definition of 3 prostitution was decided this year by the Second District Court of Appeal. See People 4 v. Hill (1980) 163 Cal.Rptr. 99. In the Hill case the defendant was prosecuted under 5 California's pimping and pandering statutes. Both of those statutes include "prostitution" 6 as an operative term. As to the meaning of the term, the Court of Appeal states:

7 It is to be noted that Penal Code Section 266h does not define 8 the word "prostitution." In People v. Fixler (1976) 56 Cal.App.3d 321, 128 9 Cal.Rptr. 363, the court defined the term "prostitution" as that term is 10 used in Penal Code Section 266i, the pandering offense. But Penal Code 11 Section 266i, like Penal Code Section 266h, does not define the term 12 "prostitution." The Fixler court held that it was construing the term 13 "prostitution" to cover sexual acts such as masturbation, oral copulation, 14 and common lewdness for money. In so construing the term "prostitution" 15 as used in Penal Code Section 266i, the Fixler court relied upon dictionary 16 definitions of "common lewdness of a woman for gain," the "act or practice 17 of engaging in sexual intercourse for money" and the definition of "prostitution" 18 found in Penal Code Section 647(b), as including "any lewd act between 19 persons for money or other consideration." (Citation) This subdivision of 20 647 relates to the misdemeanor offense of "disorderly conduct." The 21 Fixler court's interpretation of the term "prostitution" for purposes of 22 Penal Code Section 266i was followed in People v. Grow (1977) 84 Cal.App.3d 23 310, 148 Cal.Rptr. 648, but only insofar as it adopted the definition in 24 Penal Code Section 647, subdivision (b). . . .

25 The California Supreme Court recently had occasion to deal with the 26 phrase, "lewd or dissolute conduct," as it is used in Penal Code Section 27 647, subdivision (a). This phrase, which is similar to the phrase "lewd 28 act," used as part of the definition of "prostitution" in Penal Code Section 29 647, subdivision (b), has been attacked as being unconstitutionally vague.

30 In Pryor v. Municipal Court (1979) 25 Cal.3d 238, 158 Cal.Rptr. 330, 31 599 Pac.2d 636, our California high court construed the terms "lewd" 32 conduct and "dissolute" conduct, in a well defined, limited manner so as 33 to make the statutory provision satisfy constitutional standards of specificity.
34 . . .

35 If the term "prostitution," . . . is to be construed to cover "lewd or 36 dissolute acts in return for money or other consideration," as set forth by

1 the trial court in the instructions given in the case before us, a limitation 2 of the meaning of the terms "lewd" and "dissolute," similar to that made 3 by the Pryor court, must be applied to preclude the definition of "prostitution" 4 . . . from being unconstitutionally vague. Accordingly, we construed the 5 term "prostitution" . . . as meaning sexual intercourse between persons 6 for money or other considerations and only those "lewd or dissolute" acts 7 between persons for money or other consideration as set forth in the 8 Pryor case.

9 The full import of the Hill case will be discussed infra in the section 10 entitled "Section 647(b) is Unconstitutionally Vague Because the Definition of the 11 Crime Rests on the Meaning of Such Terms as 'Any Lewd Act' and 'Or Other 12 Consideration'."

California Supreme Court

Review of Section 647(b)

4 The preceding pages have demonstrated that the bulk of cases interpreting 5 the definition of "prostitution" have involved prosecutions under statutes other than 6 Penal Code Section 647(b), such as the pimping and pandering statutes. The only 7 intermediate appellate court cases reviewing Section 647(b) or its predecessor have 8 been Brandt, supra, (Appellate Department of the San Joaquin Superior Court), Leffel, 9 supra, (Fifth District Court of Appeal), and Norris, supra, (Appellate Department of 10 the Los Angeles Superior Court). None of these cases decided issues concerning the 11 constitutionality of Section 647(b) but, rather, involved questions of sufficiency of 12 evidence or interpretation of words and phrases. Notwithstanding the number of 13 years that Penal Code Section 647(b) and its predecessor have been in existence, and 14 the thousands of arrests which are made for violations each year throughout the 15 state, it is amazing that there are only three reported opinions concerning the statute 16 from intermediate appellate courts.

17 Only once has the California Supreme Court reviewed Section 647(b). In 18 People v. Superior Court (Hartway) (1977) 19 Cal.3d 338, the Court considered and 19 decided two issues: (1) whether the statute was being discriminatorily enforced in 20 violation of equal protection, and (2) whether the word "solicit" as used in the statute 21 was unconstitutionally vague. The Court answered each question in the negative.
22 The Court defined the term "solicit" as follows: "to ask earnestly; to ask for the 23 purpose of receiving; to endeavor to obtain by asking or pleading; to entreat, implore, 24 or importune; to make petition to; to plead for; to try to obtain . . . While it does 25 imply a serious request, it requires no particular degree of importunity, entreaty, 26 imploration, or supplication. . . ." Hartway, supra, at 346. With respect to the 27 issue of discriminatory enforcement, the Court held that the police did not violate 28 equal protection by concentrating their efforts on investigations and arrests of prostitutes 29 instead of the customers. Justices Tobriner and Wright dissented on this issue.
30 Chief Justice Bird and Justice Tobriner dissented from the denial of rehearing. It 31 appears that Hartway was decided by the Court when it was in transition. The 32 majority opinion was written by Justice Clark, joined by Justices Mosk, Richardson, 33 and Sullivan (Sullivan was retired and sitting under temporary assignment until his 34 successor was confirmed). The dissenting opinion was written by Acting Chief Justice 35 Tobriner and was concurred in by Justice Wright (Wright was retired, but like Sullivan, 36 was sitting on temporary assignment until his successor was confirmed). Since the

1 Court was in a period of great transition, one wonders whether the Hartway case 2 would be decided the same way today.

Legislative Recognition of a Right to Sexual Privacy

California law is consonant with English common law in that simple fornication has never been illegal in this state. Other forms of private sex were outlawed until very recently, e.g., sodomy, oral copulation, adulterous cohabitation. It was not until 1976 that all forms of private sexual conduct between consenting adults (not involving money or other consideration) were decriminalized by the Legislature.^{42/} This action by the California Legislature came some 15 years after the first such decriminalization by a state legislature in the United States.

In 1961 Illinois became the first state to decriminalize such private sexual conduct, following the recommendations of the Model Penal Code of the American Law Institute. Seven years elapsed before Connecticut became the second state to adopt those recommendations. Today there are twenty-three states in all which have recognized a right to sexual privacy by decriminalizing such conduct either legislatively or judicially.^{43/}

Recognition of Sexual Privacy
by the Federal Judiciary

The right to privacy is not specifically mentioned in the United States Constitution. That concept gained significance as a legal right in the famous law review article by Samuel D. Warren and Louis B. Brandeis written in 1890.^{44/} They emphasized the need for judicial protection against the ever increasing invasions of individual privacy. They recognized that the exact scope of this right would develop as society changed and that it would be necessary for judges to "define anew the exact nature and extent of such protection."

This law review article became a catalyst for judicial recognition of the right to privacy in American jurisprudence.^{45/} In its early development the right to privacy was found to stem from the Fourth and Fifth Amendments. The United States Supreme Court described these Amendments as a shield against governmental invasions "of the sanctity of a man's home and the privacies of life."^{46/} In Union Pacific Railroad v. Botsford (1891) 141 U.S. 250, 251, the Supreme Court held that the right to privacy encompasses the right of individuals to control their own bodies, stating:

No right is held more sacred, or is more carefully guarded . . . than the right of every individual to the possession and control of his own person, from all restraint or interferences of others.

No discussion of the early history of the right to privacy and its judicial recognition would be complete without reference to Justice Brandeis' dissenting opinion in Olmstead v. United States (1928) 277 U.S. 438, 478.

The makers of our Constitution undertook to secure conditions favorable to the pursuit of happiness. They recognized the significance of man's spiritual nature, of his feelings and of his intellect. They knew that only a part of the pain, pleasure and satisfactions of life are to be found in material things. They sought to protect Americans in their beliefs, their thoughts, their emotions and their sensations. They conferred, as against the government, the right to be let alone, the most comprehensive of rights and right most valued by civilized men. To protect that right, every unjustifiable intrusion by the government upon the privacy of the individual, whatever the means employed, must be deemed a violation (Italics added.)

1 The right to control one's own body in deciding medical treatment, for 2 example, is not restricted to the wise. The now Chief Justice Burger, in his dissent 3 in Application of President & Board of Directors of Georgetown Col., 118 U.S.App.D.C.
4 90, at page 97, 331 F.2d 1010, at page 1017, commented:

5 Nothing in this utterance suggests that Justice Brandeis thought an 6 individual possessed these rights only as to sensible beliefs, valid thoughts, 7 reasonable emotions, or well-founded sensations. I suggest he intended to 8 include a great many foolish, unreasonable and even absurd ideas which do 9 not conform, such as refusing medical treatment even at great risk.

10 (Emphasis added.)

11 This basic foundation—beyond constitution and statute—of the right to 12 privacy is found in the classic treatise, On Liberty, by John Stuart Mill (George 13 Routledge 1905). In that work, the philosophical underpinnings find their most literate 14 expression:

15 [T]here is a sphere of action in which society, as distinguished from 16 the individual, has, if any, only an indirect interest; comprehending all 17 that portion of a person's life and conduct which affects only himself, or 18 if it also affects others, only with their free, voluntary, and undeceived 19 consent and participation. When I say only himself, I mean directly, and 20 in the first instance; for whatever affects himself, may affect others 21 through himself; This then, is the appropriate region of human 22 liberty. It comprises, first, the inward domain of consciousness; demanding 23 liberty of conscience, in the most comprehensive sense; liberty of thought 24 and feeling; absolute freedom of opinion and sentiment on all subjects, 25 practical or speculative, scientific, moral, or theological Secondly, 26 the principle requires liberty of tastes and pursuits; of framing the plan 27 of our life to suit our own character; of doing as we like, subject to such 28 consequences as may follow; without impediment from our fellow-creatures, 29 so long as what we do does not harm them, even though they should 30 think our conduct foolish, perverse, or wrong

31 . . . The only freedom which deserves the name, is that of pursuing 32 our own good in our own way, so long as we do not attempt to deprive 33 others of theirs, or impede their efforts to obtain it. Each is the proper 34 guardian of his own health, whether bodily, or mental and spiritual. Mankind 35 are greater gainers by suffering each other to live as seems good to 36 themselves, than by compelling each to live as seems good to the rest.

1 In addition, Mill gives substance to the concept of "compelling state 2 interest" when he asserts:

3 . . . one very simple principle, as entitled to govern absolutely the 4 dealings of society with the individual in the way of compulsion and 5 control, whether the means used be physical force in the form of legal 6 penalties, or the moral coercion of public opinion. That principle is, that 7 the sole end for which mankind are warranted, individually, or collectively, 8 in interfering with the liberty of action of any of their number, is self-9 protection. That the only purpose for which power can be rightfully 10 exercised over any member of a civilized community, against his will, is 11 to prevent harm to others. His own good, either physical or moral, is 12 not a sufficient warrant. He cannot rightfully be compelled to do or 13 forbear because it will be better for him to do so, because it will make 14 him happier, because, in the opinions of others, to do so would be wise, 15 or even right. These are good reasons for remonstrating with him or 16 reasoning with him, or persuading him, or entreating him, but not for 17 compelling him, or visiting him with any evil in case he do otherwise.
18 To justify that, the conduct from which it is desired to deter him, must 19 be calculated to produce evil to someone else. The only part of the 20 conduct of any one, for which he is amenable to society, is that which 21 concerns others. In the part which merely concerns himself, his independence 22 is, of right, absolute. Over himself, over his own body and mind, the 23 individual is sovereign. (Emphasis added)

24 It was not until 1965 that the Supreme Court recognized that the right to 25 privacy was a basic right implicitly protected by the Federal Constitution.
26 Griswold v. Connecticut (1965) 381 U.S. 479. Although there was disagreement as to 27 within which Amendments of the Constitution this right was to be impliedly found, 28 seven justices agreed that it existed. Interestingly enough, the Griswold case involved 29 the right to privacy in a sexual context. Since the case involved a married couple, 30 the Court discussed the right in terms of "marital privacy."

31 Over the next twelve years the federal courts methodically expanded the 32 parameters of the right to privacy. In 1967 the Supreme Court held that the right 33 to privacy protects persons, not places; even when technically in a public place, a 34 person may have a reasonable expectation of privacy against surreptitious governmental 35 action. Katz v. United States (1967) 88 S.Ct. 507. In 1968 the United States Court 36 of Appeals held that the Indiana sodomy law may violate the right to marital privacy

1 if it failed to allow a husband to assert a defense of "consent" in a prosecution for 2 having anal intercourse with his wife. Cotner v. Henry (7th Cir., 1968) 394 F.2d 3 873, 875. In 1969 the Supreme Court again addressed the issue of sexual privacy in 4 a case involving prosecution for possession of obscene material in the privacy of a 5 person's home. In Stanley v. Georgia (1969) 394 U.S. 557, 564-565, the Court noted 6 that an individual has a "right to satisfy his intellectual and emotional needs in the 7 privacy of this own home." The Court added, "For also fundamental is the right to 8 be free, except in very limited circumstances, from unwanted governmental intrusions 9 into one's privacy." The next year a three-judge court voided the Texas sodomy law 10 on the grounds that it provided for no exceptions from prosecution for private sexual 11 relations and therefore violated the right to marital privacy. Buchanan v. Batchelor
12 (N.D. Tex., 1970) 308 F.Supp. 729, 732-733.^{47/}

13 That same year a federal court in California held that extramarital hetero-14 sexual cohabitation which was discreet — not notorious or scandalous — was within 15 the plaintiff's right to privacy and that the government could not condition employment 16 on a waiver of that right. Mindel v. U.S. Civil Service Commission (N.D.Cal., 1970) 17 312 F.Supp. 584, 487. A decision from a federal court in the eastern part of the 18 country also activated the right to privacy that year to protect a police officer 19 from losing his job merely because he was a practicing nudist who gathered with 20 fellow nudists on weekends. Bruns v. Pomerleau (D.Md., 1970) 319 F.Supp.58. In 21 1972 the Supreme Court ended the debate over whether the right they discussed in 22 Griswold was limited to marital privacy. In Eisenstadt v. Baird (1972) 405 U.S. 438, 23 453, Mr. Justice Brennan, writing for the majority, stated:

24 It is true that in Griswold the right of privacy in question inhered 25 in the marital relationship. Yet the married couple is not an independent 26 entity with a mind and heart of its own, but an association of two individuals 27 each with a separate intellectual and emotional make-up. If the right to 28 privacy means anything, it is the right of the individual, married or single, 29 to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so funda-30 mentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a 31 child.

32 That same year a three-judge court found that a Congressional enactment 33 denying food stamps to needy households consisting of unrelated persons violated the 34 right to privacy and freedom of association of such persons. The district court 35

36 ^{47/} Reversed on procedural grounds only.

1 recognized that such an attempt to regulate nontraditional living arrangements is 2 inconsistent with fundamental values of privacy and personal autonomy. Moreno v.
3 Department of Agriculture (D.C.D.C., 1972) 345 F.Supp. 310. In 1973 the Supreme 4 Court further expanded the right to sexual privacy. In Roe v. Wade (1973) 410 U.S.
5 113, the Court held that a Texas abortion statute which forbade an abortion except 6 to save the life of the mother violated the right to privacy. Even though important 7 state interests were involved in protecting the fetus, the government interest was 8 not compelling enough to infringe on the mother's freedom of choice to terminate 9 the pregnancy at will during the first trimester. The Roe case again emphasized 10 that this right to privacy was an individual right.

11 This ever expanding right to privacy continued to gain almost unrestricted 12 momentum until the issue of homosexuality was raised. Two anonymous plaintiffs 13 manufactured a civil suit to enjoin the enforcement of the Virginia sodomy law 14 under which they said they feared prosecution because they were practicing homosexuals.
15 In a two-to-one decision a three-judge district court denied them the relief sought — 16 quoting from the Bible! Doe v. Commonwealth's Attorney for the City of Richmond
17 (E.D.Va., 1975) 403 F.Supp. 1199. The Supreme Court, three justices dissenting, summarily
18 affirmed after the plaintiff's appealed to that Court from the lower court ruling.^{48/} 19 The following year the Supreme Court clarified the import and precedential value of 20 Doe v. Commonwealth. In Carey v. Population Services International (1977) 97 S.Ct.
21 2010, Justice Brennan, writing for the majority, stated that Doe is not to be considered 22 binding precedent and that the extent to which private sexual conduct between 23 consenting adults is protected by the Federal Constitution is still an open question.^{49/}

24 Thus, while the federal courts and particularly the Supreme Court has 25 recognized a right to privacy, with application to certain sexual matters, the full 26 extent of that federal right and its application to private sexual conduct of adults is 27 not yet resolved.

2 State Court Decisions
3 and State Constitutions

4 Almost simultaneous with the seeming setback of Doe v. Commonwealth, 5 several state appellate courts considered the issue of sexual privacy and found that 6 the Federal Constitution protects private sexual relations between consenting adults.
7 In State v. Elliot (N.M.App., 1975) 539 P.2d 207, the New Mexico Court of Appeals 8 came to such a conclusion even though none of the parties or attorneys in the action 9 raised the issue. That case involved a prosecution under the sodomy law of that 10 state. The defendant was convicted under facts indicating that force was involved 11 in obtaining the sex acts. The Court, sua sponte, held that the statute was overbroad 12 in violation of the right to privacy because it did not provide for the defense of 13 "consent." One year later the New Mexico Supreme Court reversed and held that 14 the Court of Appeals should not have reached the issue on its own initiative.^{50/}

15 Two different panels of the Arizona Court of Appeals also held that 16 state's sodomy laws unconstitutional in 1975. In one case the defendant was charged 17 with sodomizing his wife, and the other involved unmarried persons. In both cases 18 force was alleged, and the defendants claimed "consent" as a defense. Both panels 19 came to the conclusion that the Federal Constitution protects consensual sodomy in 20 private. State v. Bateman (Ariz.App., 1975) 547 P.2d 732; State v. Calloway (Ariz.App., 21 1975) 542 P.2d 1147. The cases were consolidated for hearing in the Arizona Supreme 22 Court, and the following year that court reversed both decisions. State v. Bateman 23 and Calloway (Ariz., 1976) 547 P.2d 6. Citing the Bible, that court held that private 24 sexual relations are constitutionally protected except insofar as the state has an 25 interest in regulating them; ever since biblical times, the court said, the state has 26 seen fit to prohibit deviate sexual relations.

27 Also in 1975, a trial court in New York held that the New York consensual 28 sodomy law, which law allowed consensual sodomy between spouses but forbade it if 29 the parties were not married to each other, violated the right to privacy and equal 30 protection for single individuals. People v. Rice & Mehr (1975) 363 N.Y.S.2d 484.
31 That case was later reversed by the New York Court of Appeals. That court felt 32 that the record did not present sufficient facts for deciding the issue, and it therefore 33 sent the case back to the trial court for further proceedings. The Court of Appeals 34 did, however, indicate that Doe v. Commonwealth was not dispositive and that the

35
36 ^{50/} State v. Elliot (N.M. 1976) 551 P.2d 1352

1 Court might be receptive to deciding the privacy issue in a future case.^{51/}

2 In 1976 the Iowa Supreme Court declared that state's sodomy law unconsti-3 tutional, holding that it violated the right to privacy of married couples and hetero-4 sexual unmarried individuals. State v. Pilcher (Iowa 1976) 242 N.W.2d 348. The 5 court left open the question as to whether the right to privacy extended to homosexual 6 relations in private, feeling somewhat uneasy on this issue in view of Doe v. Commonweal
7 That same year the Iowa Legislature approved a bill to decriminalize private, adult, 8 consensual sexual conduct for all adults regardless of sexual orientation.

9 The next year a fornication statute was declared unconstitutional by the 10 New Jersey Supreme Court. In the case of State v. Saunders (N.J., 1977) 381 A.2d 11 333, the defendants were convicted under a statute which prohibited "an act of 12 illicit sexual intercourse by a man, married or single, with an unmarried woman."
13 Defendants raised constitutional objections to their conviction in the trial court.
14 Although agreeing that the right to privacy had been expanded to include unmarried 15 individuals by the Eisenstadt case in 1972, the trial judge concluded that the state's 16 interest in preventing venereal disease and illegitimacy were sufficiently "compelling" 17 to justify the prohibition.

18 On appeal, the New Jersey Supreme Court held:

19 We conclude that the conduct statutorily defined as fornication 20 involves, by the very nature, a fundamental personal choice. Thus, the 21 statute infringes upon the right of privacy. Although persons may differ 22 as to the propriety and morality of such conduct and while we certainly 23 do not condone its particular manifestations in this case, such a decision 24 is necessarily encompassed in the concept of personal autonomy which our 25 Constitution seeks to safeguard . . .

26 As we stated earlier, the Court in Carey and Wade underscored the 27 inherently private nature of a person's decision to bear or beget children.
28 It would be rather anomalous if such a decision could be constitutionally 29 protected while the more fundamental decision as to whether to engage in 30 the conduct which is a necessary prerequisite to child-bearing could consti-31 tutionally prohibited. Surely, such a choice involves considerations which 32 are at least as intimate and personal as those which are involved in 33 choosing whether to use contraceptives. We therefore join with other 34 courts which have held that such sexual activities between adults are 35

36 ^{51/} People v. Rice & Mehr (N.Y., 1977) 363 N.E.2d 1371.

1 protected by the right of privacy . . .

2 Finally, we note that our doubts as to the constitutionality of the 3 fornication statute are also impelled by this Court's development of a 4 constitutionally mandated "zone" of privacy protecting individuals from 5 unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters of intimate personal and 6 family concern. It is now settled that the right of privacy guaranteed 7 under the Fourteenth Amendment has an analogue in our State Constitution.

8 Unlike the California Constitution which contains a specific provision 9 guaranteeing the right to privacy, the New Jersey Constitution has no explicit provision 10 on privacy. Notwithstanding that fact, the Court in New Jersey found the right to 11 be implicit in other provisions.

12 Having found the fornication statute to impinge on the right to privacy, 13 the court then considered whether it could be justified by any compelling state 14 interest. Four reasons were argued by the State in support of the statute: preventing 15 venereal disease, preventing an increase in illegitimate children, protecting the marital 16 relationship, and protecting public morals.

17 In response to these arguments, the court held:

18 [If the State's interest in the instant statute is that it is helpful 19 in preventing venereal disease, we conclude that it is counter-productive.
20 To the extent that any successful program to combat venereal disease 21 must depend upon affected persons coming forward for treatment, the 22 present statute operates as a deterrent to such voluntary participation.
23 The fear of being prosecuted for the "crime" of fornication can only 24 deter people from seeking such necessary treatment . . .

25 As the Court found in Carey, absent highly coercive measures, it is 26 extremely doubtful that people will be deterred from engaging in such 27 natural activities. The Court there rejected the assertion that the threat 28 of unwanted pregnancy would deter persons from engaging in extramarital 29 activities. (Citation) We conclude that the same is true for the possibility 30 of being prosecuted under the fornication statute . . . If unavailability of 31 contraceptives is not likely to deter people from engaging in illicit sexual 32 activities, it follows that the fear of unwanted pregnancies will be equally 33 ineffective . . .

34 The last two reasons offered by the State as compelling justifications 35 for the enactment — that it protects the marital relationship and the 36 public morals by preventing illicit sex — offer little additional support for

1 the law. Whether or not abstention is likely to induce persons to marry, 2 this statute can in no way be considered a permissible means of fostering 3 what may otherwise be a socially beneficial institution. If we were to 4 hold that the State could attempt to coerce people into marriage, we 5 would undermine the very independent choice which lies at the core of 6 the right of privacy. . . .

7 This is not to suggest that the State may not regulate, in an appropriate 8 manner, activities which are designed to further public morality. Our 9 conclusion today extends no further than to strike down a measure which 10 has as its objective the regulation of private morality. To the extent 11 that [this statute] serves as an official sanction of certain conceptions of 12 desirable lifestyles, social mores or individualized beliefs, it is not an 13 appropriate exercise of the police power.

14 Fornication may be abhorrent to the morals and deeply held beliefs 15 of many persons. But any appropriate "remedy" for such conduct cannot 16 come from legislative fiat. Private personal acts between two consenting 17 adults are not to be lightly meddled with by the State. The right to 18 personal autonomy is fundamental to a free society. Persons who view 19 fornication as opprobrious conduct may seek strenuously to dissuade people 20 from engaging in it. However, they may not inhibit such conduct through 21 the coercive power of the criminal law. . . . The fornication statute 22 mocks the dignity of both offenders and enforcers. Surely the dignity of 23 the law is undermined when an intimate personal activity between consenting 24 adults can be dragged into court and "exposed."

25 The following year a New Jersey appellate court, applying the principles 26 of the Saunders case, declared that state's sodomy law unconstitutional.^{52/}

27 A recent pronouncement on sexual privacy was delivered this year by a 28 New York appellate court. In People v. Onofre, ___ N.Y.S.2d ___, Appellate 29 Division of the Supreme Court, Fourth Department, Case No. 914/1979, decided 30 January 24, 1980, the defendant was prosecuted for violating that state's consensual 31 sodomy law. The statute prohibited oral and anal sex, whether homosexual or hetero-32 sexual in nature. Only consensual sodomy within the marital relationship was not 33 deemed criminal by this statute. Over the years the New York Legislature had 34 consistently refused to pass bills which would have decriminalized such consensual 35

1 conduct for the unmarried, thereby forcing individuals to address their privacy arguments 2 to the courts.

3 The Onofre court examined the proffered state interests in regulating 4 private sexual conduct.

5 If the interest of the State is the general promotion of morality, 6 we are then required to accept on faith the State's moral judgment.
7 Equally important in the community of man would seem to be some degree 8 of toleration of ideas and moral choices with which one disagrees. The 9 State may have a paternalistic interest in protecting an individual from 10 self-inflicted harm or self-degrading experiences. This again presupposes 11 the validity of the state's judgment, and outright proscription of certain 12 activity can easily become discriminatory governmental tyranny. Curtailing 13 activity which offends the public is a legitimate State interest but the 14 standard to be applied in such a case is the effect that behavior might 15 have on a reasonable person, not the most sensitive member of the commun-16 ity. Conduct which is carried on in an atmosphere of privacy between two 17 parties by mutual agreement has little likelihood of offending a public not 18 embarked on eavesdropping. A State interest based upon the prevention 19 of physical violence and disorder fails for the same reason. Sexual conduct 20 with an unwilling partner or one incapable of consent is proscribed by 21 other statutes. (Emphasis added.) Onofre, at page 4 of slip opinion.

22 With respect to the recognition of the right to sexual privacy, no better 23 words can be found:

24 Personal sexual conduct is a fundamental right, protected by the 25 right to privacy because of the transcendental importance of sex to the 26 human condition, the intimacy of the conduct, and its relationship to a 27 person's right to control his or her own body (citation). This right is 28 broad enough to include sexual acts between non-married persons (citations) 29 and intimate consensual homosexual conduct (citation). Onofre, at page 30 3 of the slip opinion.

31 The most recent state court decision outside of California which recognizes 32 a right to sexual privacy is Commonwealth of Pennsylvania v. Bonadio, _____ A.2d 33 _____, Pennsylvania Supreme Court Case No. 105, March term, 1979, filed May 30, 34 1980. In that case the defendants were arrested at an "adult" pornographic theatre 35 on charges of voluntary deviate sexual intercourse. "Deviate sexual intercourse" was 36 defined by statute as including oral or anal sexual conduct between human beings

1 who are not husband and wife. Defendants claimed that the classification created 2 by the statute was an infringement on their rights as unmarried persons and for this 3 reason the statute violated equal protection. The Commonwealth argued that the 4 statutory exception for spouses was in furtherance of a legitimate state interest in 5 promoting the privacy inherent in the marital relationship. The Pennsylvania Supreme 6 Court declared the "sodomy" statute unconstitutional on its face because it created 7 impermissible distinctions between married and unmarried persons with respect to 8 sexual conduct in private.

California's Recognition of Sexual Privacy

Previous to 1970 most judicial statements in California concerning privacy pertained to the law of torts. Tortious invasions of privacy usually took one of four manifestations: (1) the commercial appropriation of a person's name or likeness, (2) intrusion on one's physical solitude or seclusion, (3) publicity placing one in a false light in the public eye, and (4) public disclosure of true embarrassing facts about a person.^{53/}

The California Supreme Court recognized the Federal Constitutional right to privacy in a lawsuit attacking the constitutional validity of a statute requiring public disclosure of the financial interests of candidates for public office. In City of Carmel-by-the-Sea v. Young (1970) 2 Cal.3d 259, the Court declared the statute unconstitutionally overbroad because it intruded into both relevant and irrelevant private financial affairs of numerous public officials and employees and was not limited to only such holdings as might be affected by the duties or functions of a particular public office. The Court held that a government purpose to control or prevent activities which are constitutionally subject to state regulation may not be achieved by means which sweep unnecessarily broadly and thereby invade protected freedoms. The Court then recognized that the right to privacy is a basic right even though not expressly mentioned in the Federal Constitution. The Court held that one's personal financial affairs are protected by the right to privacy, stating:

[T]he right of privacy concerns one's feelings and one's own peace of mind (citation omitted) and certainly one's personal financial affairs are an essential part of such peace of mind.^{54/}

The privacy provision of the California Constitution, article 1, section 1,^{55/} is independent from and broader than the protections afforded under the Federal Constitution. "The [federal] Constitution does not explicitly mention any right of privacy." Roe v. Wade (1973) 93 S.Ct. 705, 726. Until recently, neither did the California Constitution. The Court of Appeal in N.O.R.M.L. v. Gain (1979) 161 Cal.Rptr. 181, 183-184, sets out a summary of the history of California's explicit ^{53/} Prosser, Torts (4th Ed.) Section 117, pp. 804-814.

^{54/} City of Carmel-by-the Sea v. Young (1970) 2 Cal.3d 259, 268.

^{55/} As reworded by further amendment in 1974, article 1, section 1, now reads:

All people are by nature free and independent, and have certain inalienable rights. Among these are enjoying and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining safety, happiness, and privacy.

1 constitutional right to privacy:

2 [I]n November 1972, the voters of California specifically amended 3 article 1, section 1 of our state Constitution to include among the various 4 "inalienable" rights of "all people" the right of privacy. White v. Davis 13 5 Cal.3d 757, 773, 120 Cal.Rptr. 94, 105, 533 P.2d 222, 233.

6 A definitive map detailing the outside dimensions of this amendment's 7 protections has not yet been published by the California courts. (Valley 8 Bank of Nevada v. Superior Court (1975) 15 Cal.3d 652, 656, 125 Cal.Rptr.
9 553, 542 P.2d 977, see People v. Privitera (1979) 23 Cal.3d 697, 711, 153
10 Cal.Rptr. 431, 439, 591 P.2d 919, 927. (Bird, C.J. Diss, Opn.: "The right 11 of privacy is a concept of as yet undetermined parameteres.") However, 12 we have learned enough from the first sketchings (People v. Privitera, 13 supra) to disagree with respondent's opinion that the right is limited to 14 protection from governmental snooping.

15 People v. Privitera, supra, determined only that the right under 16 consideration does not encompass "a right of access to drugs of unproven 17 efficacy" in the treatment of terminal cancer. (23 Cal.3d at p.709, 153 18 Cal.Rptr. at p. 438, 591 P.2d at p. 926.) Although the majority there 19 also noted that the "principle objective" of the constitutional amendment 20 was to restrain information activities of government and business, the 21 decision does not purport to constrain the application of this constitutional 22 protection to such cases. (Id., at pp. 709 710 153 Cal.Rptr. 431, 591 P.2d 23 919.)

24 Furthermore, the United States Supreme Court decisions regarding the 25 right of privacy are not binding on California courts.

26 In such constitutional adjudication, our first referent is California 27 law and the full panoply of rights Californians have come to expect as 28 their due. Accordingly, decisions of the United States Supreme Court 29 defining fundamental rights are persuasive authority to be afforded respectful 30 consideration, but are to be followed by California courts only when they 31 provide no less individual protection than is guaranteed by California law.
32 Serrano v. Priest, 18 Cal.3d 728, 764, 135 Cal.Rptr. 345, 366, 557 P.2d 33 929, 950, quoting People v. Longwill, 14 Cal.3d 943, 951, fn. 4, 123 Cal.Rptr.
34 297, 538 P.2d 753.

35 It must be noted again that the right of privacy is "a concept of as yet 36 undetermined parameters . . ." See dissent in People v. Privitera (1979) 23 Cal.3d

1 697, 153 Cal.Rptr. 431. The concept is yet expanding and as yet judicially unmeasured.

2 The People's brief in the municipal court implied that the California right 3 to privacy is narrowly limited to instances of privacy invasions by way of clandestine 4 surveillance. A circumspect reading of Privitera, supra, and N.O.R.M.L., supra, 5 indicate to the contrary. The "legislative history" of the California constitutional 6 right to privacy closely parallels the thoughts, in fact uses the exact words, of 7 Justice Brandeis in his dissent in Olmstead v. United States (1928) 48 S.Ct. 564.^{56/} 8 Based upon the "legislative intent" derived from the language of the 1972 California 9 election brochure, one must conclude that this right is not merely a shield against 10 threats to personal freedom posed by modern surveillance activities.^{57/}

11 The People's position that the right to privacy in the California constitution 12 is narrowly limited to instances of privacy invasions by way of clandestine surveillance 13 has also been rejected by a majority of the California Supreme Court in the case of 14 City of Santa Barbara v. Adamson (1980) 164 Cal.Rptr. 539. In his dissenting opinion 15 in that case, Justice Manuel, joined by Justices Clark and Richardson, states:

16 The majority, faced with the authorities delineated above, quite 17 understandably chooses to shift their focus away from the protections 18 offered by the Federal constitution. Turning instead to the comprehensive 19 terms of article 1, section 1 of the state constitution, and seizing upon 20 certain expansive general passages to be found in White v. Davis (1975) 13 21 Cal.3d 757, 120 Cal.Rptr. 94, 533 P.2d 222, they quickly and without 22 significant discussion conclude that the right of privacy set forth in that 23 ^{56/} See page 29 of this brief.

24 ^{57/} The argument in favor of the 1972 amendment contained at p.28 25 of the California Voter's Pamphlet (1972) stated:

26 The right of privacy is a right to be left alone. It is a fundamental 27 and compelling interest. It protects our homes, our families, our thoughts, 28 our emotions, our expressions, our personalities, our freedom of communion 29 and our freedom to associate with people we choose.

30 The right to privacy is much more than "unnecessary wordage."
31 It is fundamental to any free society. Privacy is not now guaranteed 32 by our State Constitution. This simple amendment will extend various 33 court decisions on privacy to insure protection of our basic rights.

34 See also White v. Davis (1975) 13 Cal.3d 757, 774. The Supreme Court in White 35 acknowledged the propriety of judicial resort to such ballot arguments as an aid 36 in construing such amendments. White, 775, at footnote 11

This new constitutional provision was self-executing and needed no enabling legislation. It conferred a judicial right of action on all Californians not only against government intrusions but also against encroachments by private individuals. White, supra, at p.773.

1 provision "comprehends the right to live with whomever one wishes or, at 2 least, to live in an alternate family with persons not related by blood, 3 marriage or adoption." (Citation to majority opinion) Having just discovered 4 the "fundamental" right they seek, they then proceed to set in motion the 5 mighty engine of strick scrutiny. The ordinance, needless to say, does 6 not survive its batterings.

7 The Adamson case lays to rest, once and for all, the argument that the 8 California constitutional right to privacy protects individuals only against surreptitious 9 electronic surveillance. Instead, a majority of the California Supreme Court has 10 recognized that it protects the individual with respect to personal or intimate decisions 11 regarding his or her life style.

12 In 1973 the California Supreme Court did directly address the issue of 13 sexual privacy. People v. Triggs (1973) 8 Cal.3d 884, dealt with clandestine observa-
14 tions by police officers of unsuspecting users of men's restrooms. The Court unanimously 15 stated:

16 Most persons using public restrooms have no reason to expect that 17 a hidden agent of the state will observe them. The expectation of privacy 18 a person has when he enters a restroom is reasonable and is not diminished 19 or destroyed because the toilet stall being used lacks a door.

20 Reference to expectations of privacy as a Fourth Amendment touch-21 stone received the endorsement of the United States Supreme Court in 22 Katz v. United States (1968) 389 U.S. 347, 88 S.Ct. 507, 19 L.Ed.2d 576.
23 Viewed in the light of Katz, the standard for determining what is an 24 illegal search is whether defendant's "reasonable expectation of privacy 25 was violated by unreasonable governmental intrusion."^{58/}

26 The Court specifically based its decision in Triggs on the Fourth Amendment 27 to the United States Constitution and on article I, section 19 of the State constitution, 28 recognizing that under the State constitution, the Court retains the power to impose 29 higher standards on searches and seizures than required by the Federal Constitution.^{59/} 30 Article I, Section 19 contains a "guarantee of personal privacy" against unreasonable 31 searches or seizures.^{60/}

32 In 1975 the California Legislature voted to decriminalize private sexual 33 conduct between consenting adults by repealing prohibitions against consensual sodomy, 34

1 oral copulation, and adulterous cohabitation. The "Consenting Adults Act" or the so-2 called "Brown Bill" (named after Assembly person Willie Brown (D/San Francisco))
3 became effective on January 1, 1976.^{61/} This manifested a major philosophical change 4 and a legal recognition that the state has no business regulating the private morals 5 and private lives of its adult residents in matters of consensual sexual behavior.
6 Later, it would be seen that the "Consenting Adults Act" created two major inconsistencies 7 in the state's penal law.^{62/}

8 In 1976 the California Court of Appeal granted injunctive relief against a 9 policy regulation of a local housing authority which prohibited rentals to unmarried 10 cohabitators of the opposite sex. The court in Atkisson v. Kern County Housing Authority 11 (1976) 59 Cal.App.3d 89, stated:

12 The section X.A. policy regulation with which we are concerned 13 automatically presumes immorality, irresponsibility and the demoralization 14 of tenant relations from the fact of unmarried cohabitation. Such presump-15 tions are not necessarily universally true in fact. As such the policy 16 creates an unconstitutional irrebutable presumption and must be held to 17 be invalid denial of due process.

18 The court then discussed cases such as Griswold and Eisenstadt regarding 19 the right to privacy. It noted that the ban against unmarried cohabiting adults was 20 not merely a regulation but a total prohibition. As such, the court held, the "ban 21 contravenes the principles laid down in the above cases and is an invalid infringement 22 of the right of privacy." Atkisson, supra, at 98.

23 Last year Edmund G. Brown Jr., Governor of California, issued Executive 24 Order B-54-79, prohibiting administrative agencies under the jurisdiction of the 25 Governor from discriminating in state employment against any individual solely upon 26 the individual's sexual preference. The primary premise for this order was that 27 "Article I of the California Constitution guarantees the inalienable right of privacy 28 for all people which must be vigorously enforced. . ." ^{63/} This placed the Executive 29 Branch in congruence with the Legislature and Judiciary in recognizing the right to 30 sexual privacy in California as a basic right entitled to special protection.

32 ^{61/} California Statutes, 1975, chapter 71, section 10 & chapter 877, section 33 2.

34 ^{62/} One was an inconsistency with subdivision (a) of Section 647 of 35 the Penal Code which prohibited soliciting a lewd act. The other is the inconsistency 36 with subdivision (b) of the same section which prohibits engaging in a lewd act for money or other consideration.

^{63/} The full text of the executive order, issued by Governor Brown on April 4, 1979, reads:

1 Also last year the California Supreme Court strictly scrutinized subdivision 2 (a) of Section 647 which prohibits a person, while in a public place, from soliciting 3 or engaging in lewd or dissolute conduct. Much can be learned from Pryor v. Municipal 4 Court (1979) 25 Cal.3d 238, regarding a method of analyzing the scope and constitutional 5 of subdivision (b) of the same section of the Penal Code.

6 In Pryor the petitioner raised several questions concerning the definition 7 of words, freedom of speech, constitutional vagueness and overbreadth, and inconsistency 8 with recent legislative enactments, many of which are the same legal issues involved 9 in the instant case. While a literally identical approach may not be appropriate for 10 an analysis of the defects of subdivision (b), the basic legal and philosophical approach 11 of Pryor should prove to be helpful.

12 At this juncture only the privacy aspects of the Pryor decision will be 13 reviewed. The Supreme Court took notice of the passage of the "Consenting Adults 14 Act" and attempted to reconcile any inconsistencies between that act and subdivision 15 (a) of Section 647. In order to avoid First Amendment problems, the Court overruled 16 two previous appellate decisions which held that public solicitation of private sexual 17 conduct was prohibited by 647(a).^{64/} "[W]e conclude that Mesa and Dudley are 18 inconsistent with the protection of private conduct afforded by the Brown Act and 19 are no longer viable. . ." Pryor at page 254. Furthermore, the Court held that for 20 purposes of Section 647(a), some places would no longer be considered "open to the 21 public" thus recognizing privacy protection for sexual activity conducted within their 22 confines.

24 WHEREAS, Article I of the California Constitution guarantees the 25 inalienable right of privacy for all people which must be vigorously 26 enforced; and

27 WHEREAS, government must not single out sexual minorities for 28 harassment or recognize sexual orientation as a basis for discrimination; and 29 WHEREAS, California must expand its investment in human capital 30 by enlisting the talent of all members of society;

31 NOW, THEREFORE, I, Edmund G. Brown Jr., Governor of the State 32 of California, by virtue of the power of and authority vested in me by 33 the Constitution and statutes of the State of California, do hereby issue 34 this order to become effective immediately:

35 The agencies, departments, boards, and commissions within the Execu-36 tive Branch of state government under the jurisdiction of the Governor shall not discriminate in state employment against any individual based solely upon the individual's sexual preference. Any alleged acts of discrimination in violation of this directive shall be reported to the State Personnel Board for resolution.

(1967) 250 Cal.App.2d Supp. 955.

1 In re Steinke, supra, which involved sexual acts in a closed room 2 in a massage parlor, suggested that a closed room made available to 3 different members of the public at successive intervals was a place "open 4 to the public" under section 647, subdivision (a). (See 2 Cal.App.3d at 5 p.576, 82 Cal.Rptr. 789; People v. Freeman (1977) 66 Cal.App.3d 424, 428-

15 While the United States Supreme Court has left open the question 16 whether the "zone of privacy" recognized in Griswold v. Connecticut

25 the New Jersey court reasoned in Saunders, supra, "It would be rather 26 anomalous if [a person's decision to bare or beget children] could be 27 constitutionally protected while the more fundamental decision as to 28 whether to engage in the conduct which is a necessary prerequisite to 29 child-bearing could be constitutionally prohibited." (381 A.2d, at p. 340) 30 At least one decision of the California Court of Appeal appears to be in 31 accord. (Fults v. Superior Court (1979)^{65/} 88 Cal.App.3d 899, 904, 152

3 In summary, voters have recognized a right to privacy by amending the 4 State constitution. The Legislature acted in furtherance of this right when it decriminalized 5 most forms of private sexual behavior between consenting adults. The Governor 6 built upon this foundation when he issued an executive order prohibiting sexual 7 orientation discrimination. The Supreme Court has declared statutes unconstitutional 8 when they infringed on certain privacy rights; it has recognized another privacy 9 protection in yet another section of the California Constitution which protects all 10 person against unreasonable searches or seizures; and it has attempted to harmonize 11 statutes which apparently conflicted with these recognized privacy rights.

12 It is thus abundantly clear that this state has a comprehensive policy of 13 protecting sexual conduct in private. The prohibition against sexual conduct in 14 private when money or other consideration is involved seems to be inconsistent with 15 this pervasive policy, and, for that reason, Section 647, subdivision (b) needs to be 16 carefully scrutinized by the courts.

17 The following pages will deal with specific legal defects in the prostitution 18 statute and suggestions for remedying those defects.

LEGAL ISSUES PRESENTED

1. Is private sexual conduct between consenting adults or the decision to engage therein protected by the right to privacy under the State and Federal Constitutions?
2. What level of scrutiny should be used to determine the constitutionality of a statute regulating such private sexual conduct?
3. Is Section 647(b) unconstitutionally overbroad in violation of the right to privacy in that it prohibits all procreational, therapeutic, and recreational sex merely because money or other consideration is involved?
4. Does Section 647(b) violate the due process and privacy clauses of the State or Federal Constitutions because it infringes on the freedom of choice of individuals to privately offer money or other consideration in order to receive the amount or kind of sexual services that individual desires?
5. What compelling state interest justifies the total prohibition of such private sexual conduct merely because money or other consideration is involved?
6. Is Section 647(b) unconstitutionally vague because it fails to properly define prostitution when it uses such language as "any lewd act" or "other consideration"?
7. If some or all forms of private sex for money or other consideration are constitutionally protected, does Section 647(b) violate the free speech clauses of the State and Federal Constitutions because it appears to prohibit private and nonoffensive speech as well as public and offensive accosting and soliciting?
8. Can the scope of Section 647(b) be narrowed by the courts so that it is harmonized with the state policy protecting sexual privacy as well as avoiding constitutional problems of vagueness and overbreadth?

PRIVATE SEXUAL CONDUCT BETWEEN CONSENTING
ADULTS OR THE DECISION TO ENGAGE THEREIN IS PROTECTED BY THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY UNDER THE STATE AND FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONS

Without restating all of the arguments and authorities contained in Sections IV(a),(b),(c), and (d) of this brief, it is important to note that not merely conduct itself is protected by the right to privacy, but also the personal decision whether to engage in private sexual conduct as well as the personal decision as to the manner of engaging in such private sexual conduct, are protected by the right to privacy implicit in the Federal constitution and explicit in article 1 section 1 of the California constitution. Any attempt by the legislature to control that decision or to prohibit such conduct must be supported by a compelling state interest. The most recent California case which bears on this point is Lasher v. Kleinberg (1980) 164 Cal.Rptr. 618. In the Lasher case a minor child and its mother, as guardian et litem, brought a paternity suit against Stephen Kleinberg. After admitting paternity, Stephen filed a cross-complaint for fraud, negligent misrepresentation and negligence. Stephen alleged that the mother had falsely represented that she was taking birth control pills and that in reliance upon such representation Stephen engaged in sexual intercourse with her which eventually resulted in the birth of a baby girl unwanted by Stephen. Stephen further alleged that as a "proximate result" of her conduct he had become obligated to support the child financially as well as incurring other damages. After the mother moved for a judgment on the pleadings, the trial court dismissed the cross-complaint. Stephen appealed. On appeal the Court of Appeal states:

The critical questions before us is whether Roni's conduct toward Stephen is actionable at all. Stephen claims it is actionable as a tort. . .

Broadly speaking the word "tort" means a civil wrong other than a breach of contract, for which the law will provide a remedy in the form of an action for damages. It does not lie within the power of any judicial system, however, to remedy all human wrongs. There are many wrongs which in themselves are flagrant. For instance, such wrongs as betrayal, brutal words, and heartless disregard for the feelings of others are beyond any effective legal remedy and any practical administration of law. (Citation)

1 To attempt to correct such wrongs or give relief from their effects "may 2 do more social damage than if the law leaves them alone. . . .

3 We are in effect asked to attach tortious liability to the natural 4 results of consensual sexual intercourse. . . . Claims such as those presented 5 by plaintiff Stephen in this case arise from conduct so intensely private 6 that the courts should not be asked to nor attempt to resolve such claims.
7 Consequently, we need not and do not reach the question of whether 8 Stephen has established or pleaded tort liability on the part of Roni under 9 recognized principles of tort law. In summary, although Roni may have 10 lied and betrayed the personal confidence reposed in her by Stephen, the 11 circumstances and the highly intimate nature of the relationship wherein 12 the false representations may have occurred are such that a court should 13 not define any standard of conduct therefor. . . .

14 The claim of Stephen is phrased in the language of the tort of 15 misrepresentation. Dispite its legalism, it is nothing more than asking the 16 court to supervise the promises made between two consenting adults as to 17 the circumstances of their private sexual conduct. To do so would encourage 18 unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters affecting the individual's 19 right to privacy. In Stanley v. Georgia (1969) 394 U.S. 557, 564, 89 S.Ct.
20 1243, 1247, 22 L.Ed.2d 542, the high court recognized the right to privacy 21 as the most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued in our 22 civilization. Courts have long recognized a right of privacy in matters 23 relating to marriage, family and sex. (Citations to People v. Belous, 24 Griswold v. Connecticut, and Eisenstadt v. Baird.)

25 It is appropriate here to summarize the changes in the law since 1961 26 which make necessary a re-examination of P.C. 647(b). Previous to 1961, the California 27 Legislature did not prohibit private acts of prostitution. Section 647, subdivision 10 28 prohibited being a "common prostitute" which required as a matter of proof, a course 29 of conduct showing common, indiscriminate sexual intercourse for hire. The regulation 30 of such a course of conduct did not require the police nor the courts to inquire into 31 the private sexual behavior of its citizens. Instead a showing that a person had 32 violated the statute could be made with testimony regarding that person's course of 33 conduct in public, without regard to his or her private decisions.

34 In 1961 the legislature, for the first time, asked the police, prosecutors, 35 and courts to inquire into the private and personal decisions of its citizens when it 36 prohibited all forms of private solicitation or private engaging in sex for any considera-1 tion.

2 When section 647(b) P.C. was first enacted, the right to sexual privacy 3 was yet unrecognized. That right was first found to be implicit in the Federal 4 Constitution in 1965 when the U.S. Supreme Court decided the case of Griswold v.
5 Connecticut, supra. The right has been recognized as being specifically protected by 6 article 1, section 1, of the California constitution by legislative, executive, and judicial 7 decisions subsequent to 1972 when that state privacy protection was first enacted by 8 the voters. There exists a state policy protecting sexual privacy, as evidenced by 9 recent developments in California, e.g., passage of the "consenting adults act" by the 10 legislature, (which decriminalized private sexual behavior such as sodomy and adultery), 11 issuance of an Executive Order on sexual orientation discrimination by the Governor, 12 and by holdings of the California Supreme Court and California Courts of Appeal in 13 this state, (Belous, Triggs, Pryor, Adamson, Wellman, Fults, Atkisson, and Lasher, 14 supra).

15 There can be no question that private sexual conduct between consenting 16 adults, and the decisions as to whether or not or how to engage in such private 17 conduct is protected by the right to privacy in the state and federal constitutions.
18 Ultimately, the question is, whether this privacy right is lost merely because that 19 decision involves some form of consideration passing between the parties.

REGULATION OF PRIVATE SEXUAL CONDUCT
SHOULD BE STRICTLY SCRUTINIZED
BY THE COURTS AND SHOULD BE VOIDED ABSENT A SHOWING THAT THERE IS A COMPELLING STATE INTEREST FOR THEIR RETENTION

Whenever a statute directly infringes upon a fundamental right resting in the individual which right is guaranteed either explicitly in the Constitution (privacy) or implicitly by the development of constitutional doctrine, that statute is subject to strict scrutiny. Since Section 647(b) prohibits consenting adult sexual behavior in private, it directly affects the fundamental right to privacy as contained in article I, section 1 of the State constitution, the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution, and the due process clause of the California constitution. As a result, California law is clear that Penal Code Section 647(b) must be strictly scrutinized, and the engaging portion of that statute must be declared an unconstitutional prohibition of private sexual conduct, unless the People can demonstrate (1) a compelling state interest in such a total prohibition and (2) that the engaging portion is narrowly drawn to achieve a legitimate interest. Cotton v. Municipal Court (1976) 59 Cal.App.3d 601; Paying v. Superior Court (1976) 17 Cal.3d 908; Spencer v. G. A. MacDonald Construction Co. (1976) 63 Cal.App.3d 836; Serrano v. Priest (1976) 18 Cal.3d 728; Gray v. Whitmore (1971) 17 Cal.App.3d 1; Weber v. City Council of Thousand Oaks (1973) 9 Cal.3d 950; Reece v. Alcoholic Beverage Control Board (1976) 64 Cal.App.3d 675; In re Ahmed's Adoption (1975) 44 Cal.App.3d 810; D'Amico v. Board of Medical Examiners (1974) 11 Cal.3d 1.

Where the government restriction is designed to regulate "socially evil conduct" which creates only an indirect tension with a fundamental right, the restriction will fail unless: (1) it is within the constitutional power of the government; (2) it furthers an important or substantial government interest; (3) the government interest is unrelated to the suppression of free expression; and (4) if the incidental restriction on alleged constitutional protections is no greater than is essential to the furtherance of that interest. People ex rel. Van de Kamp v. American Art, supra, at 530.

Finally, even where a law does not directly or indirectly infringe on fundamental rights, it will still be declared unconstitutional in violation of due process if it is based upon false premises, i.e., if it is arbitrary and irrational.

The engaging portion of Section 647(b) prohibits all acts of sexual intercourse

1 in private for money or other consideration. The soliciting portion prohibits all 2 attempts to secure consent to engage in such conduct, whether the request is in 3 public or in private, whether offensive or discreet. Such a total prohibition results 4 in a direct or, at least, an indirect infringement on the right to sexual privacy.
5 Therefore, the People must show what compelling or substantial government interests 6 require such a broad statute.

Procreational Sex Should be Protected

Procreational sex for money is outlawed by Section 647(b). In his dissenting opinion in the case of Fournier v. Lopez (attached with the exhibits for judicial notice by the Court), Court of Appeal Justice Parrish writes:

The question is, may two people strike an enforceable bargain that if they have a baby, that between themselves, only one will be financially responsible for the child's upbringing?

The majority say no because the agreement was based upon an "illicit consideration of meretricious sexual services." (Marvin v. Marvin (1976) 18 Cal.3d 660, 671, 672, 674, 683, 684.) They contend this was an agreement for prostitution. (Marvin at pp. 674, 686).

Penal Code section 647, subdivision (b) proscribes prostitution. But to describe either the father, the mother or both in this case as a prostitute(s) is completely gratuitous.

This was not a contract in aid of prostitution, it was an agreement in aid of procreation and as such cannot be deemed unenforceable as against public policy. Fournier, at page 6 of the slip opinion.

Section 647(b) is overbroad and violates the right to privacy in its prohibition of procreational sex for a consideration. This conclusion is supported by the Lasher case, supra, because whether or not sexual relations between consenting adults will be procreational or not "is best left to the individuals involved, free from any governmental interference. Lasher, supra, at p.621.

Therapeutic Sex for a Consideration
Should be Constitutionally Protected

Do single individuals have the same rights to sexual expression as married people? This question raises the controversial and often misunderstood subject of sex surrogates. For if the answer to this question is in the affirmative, then sex surrogates would be necessary in order to include single individuals in sex therapy when these individuals are unable to supply a suitable partner. The use of sex surrogates raises moral, ethical, professional, and legal problems that usually accompany such progressive techniques or ideas. Essential to a resolution of the conflicting considerations inherent in these issues is an understanding of this unique form of therapy.

SEX SURROGATE THERAPY:

The therapy, as described by Ms. Barbara M. Roberts, begins with sensate focus exercises.^{67/} This is a procedure of touching which helps the client become in touch with his body. This program includes touching exercises focusing upon various parts of the body. Touching of genitals is not made an essential part of this experience since much anxiety is usually focused there.^{68/} The general intent of this program is to sensitize the client's entire body. The exercises may include showering together but they are not specifically designed to be erotic. Rather, they are aimed at making the client aware of the sensation of touch.^{69/}

It should be kept in mind that the use of sex surrogates is supervised by a sex therapist. A common misconception is that surrogate partner therapy is an entity unto itself — separate and distinct from other forms of therapy. In reality, sex surrogate therapy is only a variation of sex therapy.^{70/} Ms. Roberts describes the role of the therapist as follows:

Not only is the physical contact between the client and the surrogate part of the written or verbal contract of therapy, but it is constantly being monitored by the therapist. An integral part of surrogate partner

^{67/} Barbara M. Roberts, M.S.W., The Use of Surrogate Partners in Sex Therapy (1979). Ms. Roberts is Director of the Center for Social and Sensory Learning in Los Angeles. She is a California state licensed therapist. The Center specializes in sex therapy for couples, and single men and women, with emphasis upon the development of intimacy as part of the treatment for sexual problems.

^{69/} Id

^{70/} Id at 4.

1 therapy is the fact that feelings on the part of either the client or the 2 surrogate regarding physical and emotional intimacy are discussed openly 3 with the therapist. A third person thereby takes responsibility for using 4 and handling transference.^{71/}

5 Consultations between the surrogate and the therapist take place before 6 each session during which the therapist will suggest what form the therapy is to 7 take. Subsequent to each session of therapy, feedback sessions are conducted to 8 enable the therapist to resolve differences of opinion, misunderstandings, and tensions 9 between client and surrogate.

10 It becomes apparent upon a review of the sex surrogate therapy, that sex, 11 as the word is commonly understood, is the least part of the therapy. If intercourse 12 does take place, it is because the therapist has suggested it for a specific therapeutic 13 purpose.^{72/}

14 THE NEED FOR SEX SURROGATE THERAPY

15 The need for this type of therapy should be beyond question in light of 16 the fact that "sexual inadequacy makes psychic invalids of thousands, more likely 17 tens of thousands of Americans each year and fractures or disrupts countless marriages." 18 The treatment is usually successful to the point that in the twenty percent (20%) of 19 the cases where the major symptoms are not completely eliminated, most patients 20 reported less sexual stress, improved family relationships, or other significant benefits.^{74/}

21 When asked about the rationale justifying the use of sex surrogates, noted 22 authority, Dr. William H. Masters, stated that he considered a single, sexually dysfunc-23 tional male a "social cripple."^{75/} "Does society want them treated?" he asked. "If 24 they are not treated, it is a discrimination of one segment of society over another."^{76/}

25 The need for this type of therapy is further illustrated by statistical 26 information which indicates the poor results of therapy administered to individuals 27 without partners.

28 This situation has involved basic administrative and procedural decisions.
29 Should the best possible climate for full return of therapeutic effort be

2 or reconstitution of sexual functions; or should there be professional 3 concession to the mores of society, with full knowledge that if a decision 4 to dodge the issue was made, a significant increase in percentage of 5 therapeutic failures must be anticipated . . . It would have been inexcusable 6 to accept referral of unmarried men and women and then give them 7 statistically less than 25% chance of reversal of their dysfunctional status 8 by treating them as individuals without partners.^{77/}

9 One commentator has suggested that this therapy is necessary because "if 10 single clients are not treated for sexual dysfunction, personal alienation will increase 11 and cause further weakening of the social fibre."^{78/}

12 POTENTIAL CRIMINAL LIABILITY

13 Laws proscribing prostitution usually prohibit the acts of hiring or attempting 14 to hire a woman to engage in sexual conduct with another person. Although surrogate 15 therapy occurs in a supervised medical environment, all or most of the participants 16 may have committed offenses under the laws against prostitution. The potential for 17 liability under various statutes has created problems in administering the therapy 18 since the surrogate may insist on receiving the fee from the therapist. Similarly, 19 the therapist may be reluctant to do this, fearing "legal accusation of pimping and 20 the professional accusation of unethical practice."^{79/} If the therapist is not willing 21 to actually pay the fee to the surrogate there is a resultant negative effect upon 22 the therapy: "The surrogate is objectified and the client is given the impression 23 that the sexual part of this therapy is separate from the core of therapy."^{80/}

24 Specific forms of liability may be divided into various categories. The 25 first and most obvious is the category of prostitution. A surrogate who offers services 26 f o r money could be punishable as a female prostitute. Some statutes, including 27 California's, are broad enough to impose similar liability for male surrogates.^{81/} 28 Under statutes where employment or supervision is sufficient involvement, persons 29 involved in administering therapy could be in violation of pandering and procuring 30 statutes^{82/} by providing said surrogates to clients. Sex clinic personnel may also be

1 subject to the laws proscribing pimping, as they may be deemed as persons soliciting 2 others to become customers for prostitution.^{83/}

3 The question is thus presented: Do the statutes prohibiting the above-4 described conduct apply to surrogate therapy? A two part test to determine the 5 answer to this question has been suggested: "The enactment of penal laws requires 6 an initial policy determination as to (1) those social and individual interests which 7 should be protected by the criminal processes, and (2) the kinds of conduct that 8 should be proscribed."^{84/} It is submitted that "our society has such a desperate 9 need for this type of treatment for both single and married persons that it cannot 10 afford to consider valid sexual therapy as an illegal act Therapeutic intercourse 11 in the sex clinic context must be considered a remedial necessity in American society, 12 not an act of prostitution for which penal discouragement is needed."^{85/}

13 The engaging portion of section 647, subdivision (b) should be declared 14 unconstitutional in that it thus unduly discriminates against the right of unmarried 15 persons to obtain effective sex therapy. Marrieds may seek sex therapy and bring 16 their spouses with them as participating partners in the therapy. An unmarried, who 17 has no partner, is either forced to undergo therapy without a sex partner, or to 18 violate section 647, subdivision (b), by directly or indirectly paying for the services 19 of a professional sex surrogate. The statute, therefore, infringes on the right of the 20 single person to engage in the form of therapy prescribed by the sex therapist if the 21 therapist and patient determine that the best form of therapy requires a sex surrogate.
22 It also transforms the therapist and his office personnel into pimps and panderers.
23 Therefore the engaging portion of section 647, subdivision (b), violates the equal 24 protection clause of the state and Federal Constitutions as well as unnecessarily 25 infringing on the right to privacy of unmarried individuals in a therapy situation.

26 The Pennsylvania Supreme Court declared the sodomy law of that jurisdiction 27 unconstitutional because, while exempting married couples from its prohibition, it 28 criminalized the same conduct when engaged in by unmarried individuals. In that 29 case the Pennsylvania Supreme Court states:

v. Fixler (1976) 56 Cal.App.3d 321.

36 ^{85/} D. Leroy, supra note 7 at 600.

1 public health, safety, welfare and morals. Yet, the police power is not 2 unlimited . . .

3 To justify the state in thus interposing its authority on behalf of the 4 public, it must appear, first, that the interest of the public generally, 5 requires such interference; and, second, that the means are reasonably 6 necessary for the accomplishment of this purpose, and not unduly oppressive 7 on individuals.

8 The threshold question in determining whether the statute in question 9 is a valid exercise of the police power is to decide whether it benefits 10 the public generally. The state clearly has a proper role to perform in 11 protecting the public from inadvertant offensive displays of sexual behavior, 12 in preventing people from being forced against their will to submit to 13 sexual contact, in protecting minors from being sexually used by adults 14 and in elimiating cruelty to animals. To accomplish these protections, a 15 broad range of criminal statutes constitute valid police power exercises, 16 including proscriptions of indecent exposure, open lewdness, rape, involuntary 17 deviate sexual intercourse, indecent assault, statutory rape, corruption of 18 minors, and cruelty to animals. The statute in question serves none of 19 the foregoing purposes. It is nugatory to suggest that it promotes a state 20 interest in the protection of marriage. The voluntary deviate sexual 21 intercourse statute has only one possible purpose: to regulate the private 22 conduct of consenting adults. Such a purpose, we believe, exceeds the 23 valid bounds of the police power while infringing the right to equal protection 24 of the laws guaranteed by the constitutions of the United States and of 25 this Commonwealth.

26 With respect to regulation of morals, the police power should properly 27 be exercised to protect each individual's right to be free from interference 28 in defining and pursuing his own morality, but not to enforce a majority 29 morality on persons whose conduct does not harm others. "No harm to 30 the secular interests of the community is involved in atypical sex practice 31 in private between consenting adult partners." Model Penal Code Section 32 207.5 - Sodomy and related offenses. Comment (TENT draft #4, 1955).
33 Many issues that are considered to be matters of morals are subject to 34 debate and no sufficient state interest justifies legislation of norms just 35 because a particular belief is followed by a number of people, or even a 36 majority. Indeed what is considered to be "moral" changes with the time

1 and is dependent upon societal background. Spiritual leadership, not the 2 government, has the responsibility for striving to improve the morality of 3 individuals. Enactment of the voluntary deviate sexual intercourse statute, 4 despite the fact that it provides punishment for what many believe to be 5 abhorrent crimes against nature and perceived sins against God, is not 6 properly within the realm of the temporal police power. . . .

7 Not only does the statute in question exceed the proper bounds of 8 the police power, but, in addition, it offends the constitution by creating 9 a classification based on marital status (making deviate acts criminal 10 when performed by unmarried persons) where such differential treatment 11 is not supported by a sufficient state interest and thereby denies equal 12 protection of the laws. . . .

13 The Commonwealth submits that the classification is justified on the 14 grounds that the legislature intended to forbid, generally, voluntary "deviate" 15 sexual intercourse, but created an exception for persons whose exclusion 16 is claimed to further a state interest in promoting the privacy inherent in 17 the marital relationship. We do not find such a justification for the 18 classification to be reasonable or to have a fair and substantial relation 19 to the object of the legislation. Commonwealth of Pennsylvania v. Bonadio, 20 supra, at 2-6 of the slip opinion.^{86/}

21 In response to the majority opinion in the Bonadio case, Justice Nex filed 22 a dissenting opinion in which he states:

23 That the majority would suggest that it is beyond the state's power 24 to regulate public health, safety, welfare, and morals is incredible. I 25 assume that regulation of prostitution and hard-core pornography are also 26 now prohibited by today's ruling.^{87/}

27 For the same reasons expounded by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, 28 this court should recognize that the engaging portion of section 647, subdivision (b), 29 unconstitutionally infringes on the rights of unmarried persons to engage in sexual 30 relations which would be lawful if engaged in by married persons, not only in sex 31 therapy situations, but in general, assuming an implicit marital exception to the 32 prostitution law. There has obviously never been an arrest or prosecution for a 33 husband's inducing sexual favors from his wife by giving her objects of value.

Recreational Sex for Money
Should Not be Prohibited

Not only procreational, and theraputic sex for money or other consideration should be constitutionally protected by the right to privacy, but so should sexual activity which is purely recreational. As Judge Margaret Taylor stated in her excellent opinion on the constitutionality of New York's prostitution law, "However offensive it may be, recreational commerical sex threatens no harm to the public health, safety, or welfare and, therefore, may not be proscribed." In re P (1977) 400 N.Y.S.2d 455, 468.

The California Legislature has decriminalized recreational sex in private between consenting adults when no money or other consideration is involved. Why should such sex remain prohibited merely because some consideration is involved?

Obviously the engaging portion of Section 647(b) is not a regulatory but a prohibitory statute whereby no sexual activity may be engaged in for any consideration. There is no limitation on the proscription by age, sex, or relationship of the participants.

As the Court stated in Galyon v. Municipal Court (1964) 40 Cal.Rptr. 446, at 449:

Thus the question is forthrightly presented: is it a proper exercise of the police power of the state to prohibit an act for hire which is not so prohibited for non-hire?

The Galyon court noted that the underlying conduct was not the basis for the prohibition since there was no statute proscribing it. Only when the conduct in question was done for hire was it made illegal.

When Section 647(b) was first enacted in 1961 and when the subsequent amendments were made in 1965 and 1969, many forms of private sex were illegal. Since the underlying conduct was often illegal, even when done purely and only out of love, there was no inconsistency in also making it illegal when done for money.

A statute valid when enacted may become invalid by a change in the conditions to which it is applied. Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. v. Walters (1935) 55 S.Ct. 486; Smith v. Illinois Bell Telephone Co. (1930) 51 S.Ct. 65.

"A change of conditions may invalidate a statute which was reasonable and valid when enacted. (Citation) Also, due weight must be given to new and changed conditions (citations)." Galyon, supra, at 449. Taking a fresh look at a criminal statute, the Court in Galyon declared it to be unconstitutional which statute.

1 prohibited the exhibition of one's own deformities or the deformities of another for 2 hire.

3 Unlike the circumstances surrounding Pryor v. Municipal Court, supra, 4 wherein the California Supreme Court felt compelled to overturn nearly 75 years of 5 judicial precedent on the constitutionality of Section 647(a) before it could take a 6 fresh look at the statute because of change in circumstances (passage of consenting 7 adults act), there are no court cases as precedents which have to be overturned on 8 most of the constitutional issues presented in this brief.

9 Although the engaging portion of Section 647(b) is broad enough to prohibit 10 theraputic and procreational sex for money, Section 647(b) is most often used to 11 prohibit recreational sex for money. A study regarding enforcement of this statute 12 in Los Angeles is attached to this brief as an exhibit and the Court is asked to take 13 judicial notice of it. See Coleman, Wendt, and Schrader, "Enforcement of Section 14 647(b) of the California Penal Code by the Los Angeles Police Department — Prostitution 15 and the Police," privately published in 1973 by the National Committee for Sexual 16 Civil Liberties. That study shows that the engaging portion of Section 647(b) is 17 virtually a dead letter. A more recent study in San Francisco shows that 95 percent 18 of all arrests under Section 647(b) are for solicitation rather than acts of prostitution.⁸⁸

19 Although the sodomy laws were virtually never enforced and were practically 20 unenforceable against private sexual acts of consenting adults, this did not hinder 21 courts from declaring those laws unconstitutional (see earlier sections of this brief).

22 In order to enforce the engaging portion against private recreational 23 sexual conduct for money, the police would either have to become accomplices (see 24 People v. Norris, supra, where the court held that both participants in the conduct 25 would be accomplices) or would have to violate the reasonable expectation of privacy 26 of the participants by surreptitious surveillance in violation of other constitutional 27 protections (see People v. Triggs, supra).

28 Therefore, because (1) private sex not involving consideration has been 29 decriminalized, (2) enforcement of the engaging portion would require the police to 30 engage in illegal activity themselves, and (3) most importantly because personal 31 sexual relations are constitutionally protected, California courts should not hesitate 32 to declare the engaging portion of Penal Code Section 647(b) unconstitutional.

SECTION 647(b) VIOLATES DUE PROCESS
AS WELL AS THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY
BECAUSE IT INFRINGES ON THE RIGHT OF INDIVIDUALS TO PRIVATELY OFFER MONEY IN ORDER TO RECEIVE THE AMOUNT OR KIND OF SEXUAL SERVICES THEY DESIRE

Many men choose to use prostitutes. Whether the prostitute is a male or a female, it is common knowledge that, in the overwhelming number of cases, it is males who are the customers. These men have the right to engage in sexual relations in private by virtue of the "Consenting Adults Act" and the constitutional right of privacy. They have the right to publicly make a request of another person to engage in sexual relations in private. Pryor, supra. They have the right to engage in sexual relations in places that might technically be considered public so long as no one is present who may be offended. Pryor, supra.

For a variety of reasons, many men either cannot, or feel they cannot, receive the amount or kind of sexual activity they desire unless they offer some consideration to their proposed sexual partner. The right of sexual privacy is a hollow right for such men unless they are granted the corresponding right to privately and discreetly offer money or other consideration for sexual services.

Why do men go to prostitutes and what role do prostitutes play in the lives of men? Following is a discourse by Kinsey on the subject. As women achieve a certain degree of equality, articles may be written which explore what role prostitutes play in their lives and why they use escort services, dating services, and the like. Until that time, the data itself presented in this discourse may prove valuable if the readers can ignore the rather chauvinistic presentation of that data. This article also may prompt the readers to make value judgments. We would simply urge the readers to notice whether those judgments have a basis other than their personal moral codes.

First of all, men go to prostitutes because they have insufficient sexual outlets in other directions, or because prostitution provides types of sexual activity which are not so readily available elsewhere. Many men go to prostitutes to find the variety that sexual experience with a new partner may offer. Some men go because they feel that the danger

1 of contracting venereal disease from a prostitute is actually less than it 2 would be with a girl who was not in an organized house of prostitution.
3 Some males experiment with prostitution just to discover what it means.
4 In many cases some social psychology is involved as groups of males go 5 together to look for prostitutes.

6 At all social levels men go to prostitutes because it is simpler to 7 secure a sexual partner commercially than it is to secure a sexual partner 8 by courting a girl who would not accept pay. Even at lower social levels, 9 where most males find it remarkably simple to make frequent contacts 10 with girls who are not prostitutes, there are still occasions when they 11 desire intercourse immediately and find it much simpler to obtain it from 12 a prostitute. As for college-bred males, a great majority of them are 13 utterly ineffective in securing intercourse from any girl whom they have 14 not dated for long periods of time and at considerable expense; and in 15 some cases, their only chance to secure coital experience is with a prosti-16 tute. This is, of course, particularly true if the male is away from home 17 in a strange town.

18 Hundreds of males have insisted that intercourse with a prostitute 19 is cheaper than intercourse with any other girl. The cost of dating a 20 girl, especially at the upper social level, may mount considerably through 21 the weeks and months, or even years, that it may take to arrive at the 22 first intercourse. There are flowers, candy, "coke dates," dinner engagements, 23 parties, evening entertainments, moving pictures, theatres, night clubs, 24 dances, picnics, week-end house parties, car rides, longer trips, and all 25 sorts of other expensive entertainment to be paid for, and gifts to be 26 made to the girl on her birthday, at Christmas, and on innumerable other 27 special occasions. Finally, after all this the girl may break off the whole 28 affair as soon as she realizes that the male is interested in intercourse.
29 Before the recent war the average cost of a sexual relation with a prostitute 30 was one to five dollars. This was less than the cost of a single supper 31 date with a girl who was not a prostitute; and even at the inflated prices 32 of prostitution which prevailed during the war, the cost did not amount to 33 more than many a soldier or sailor was obliged to spend on another girl 34 from whom he might not be able to obtain the intercourse which he 35 wanted.

36 Men go to prostitutes because they can pay for the sexual relations

1 and forget other responsibilities, whereas coitus with other girls may 2 involve them socially and legally beyond anything which they care to 3 undertake.

4 Men go to prostitutes to obtain types of sexual activity which they 5 are unable to obtain easily elsewhere. Few prostitutes offer any variety 6 of sexual techniques, but many of them do provide mouth-genital contacts.
7 The prostitute offers the readiest source of experience for the sadist or 8 the masochist, and for persons who have developed associations with non-9 sexual objects (fetishes) which have come to have sexual significance for 10 them because of some contact they have had in the past. Most males 11 who have participated in sexual activities in groups have found the oppor-12 tunity to do so with prostitutes. Nearly all of the opportunity that males 13 have to observe sexual activity is connected with prostitutes, and such 14 experiences are in the history of many more persons than is ordinarily 15 realized.

16 Some men go to prostitutes because they are more or less ineffective 17 in securing sexual relations with other women. This may be true of 18 males who are unusually timid. Persons who are deformed physically, 19 deaf, blind, severely crippled, spastic, or otherwise handicapped, often have 20 considerable difficulty in finding heterosexual coitus. The matter may 21 weigh heavily upon their minds and cause considerable psychic disturbance.
22 There are instances where prostitutes have contributed to establishing 23 these individuals in their own self esteem by providing their first sexual 24 contacts.

25 Finally, at the lower social levels there are persons who are feeble-26 minded, physically deformed, and so repulsive and offensive physically that 27 no woman except a prostitute would have intercourse with them. Without 28 such outlets, these individuals would become even more serious social 29 problems than they already are. Kinsey, "Significance of Prostitution," 30 Sexual Behavior in the Human Male, p. 606-608, W.B. Saunders Company, 31 1948.

32 The men who choose to offer money or other consideration to obtain 33 sexual satisfaction of a kind they are seeking are usually 30 to 60 years old.^{89/}

34 ^{89/} Jennifer James, Ph.D., and E. Joseph Jr., Esq., "Prostitution in 35 Seattle," Washington State Bar News (Aug-Sept, 1971), at 8; accord: Harry Benjamin, 36 M.D., and R.E.L. Master, Prostitution and Morality, (1964), Winick and Kinsie, The Lively Commerce, (1972).

1 The courts would not hesitate to invalidate a statute which expressly granted sexual 2 privacy rights to those who were young, physically attractive, or psychologically 3 aggressive but which denied those rights to persons who were old, unattractive, or 4 otherwise physically or psychologically impaired in their ability to find sexual partners.
5 Yet this is what is done de facto by decriminalizing private sex only when no considera-6 tion is involved.

7 Section 647(b) violates the constitutional protections of "life" and "liberty" 8 of article I, section 7 of the State constitution, "pursuit of happiness" and "privacy" 9 of article I, section 1 of that Constitution, and the due process clause of the United 10 States Constitution by infringing on the right of these men to privately and discreetly 11 offer some consideration in order to receive the amount or kind of sexual satisfaction 12 they desire.

13 Even for those who simply want to shortcut achieving their sexual goal by 14 paying hard cash immediately rather than paying for wine, food, and entertainment 15 over a prolonged period of time, the law should protect their right to sexual privacy 16 and the pursuit of happiness. In both cases, the motivation is often the same — 17 companionship, human closeness, and sex, often with very little importance given to 18 ultimate love, marriage, or long-term relationship — and the interest of the state to 19 become involved in the private lives of its citizens to the extent that it proscribes 20 this behavior is neither rational nor defensible.

21 Without reiterating the arguments dealing with the morality issues, which 22 issues are discussed sufficiently throughout this Memorandum of Points and Authorities, 23 the question of morality must be mentioned in this context. Many people do not 24 want to see women objectified as sex objects, or men either for that matter.
25 The objectification of human beings as sex objects is a morality matter, and one 26 must be cautious about the extent to which the criminal law should impose the 27 moral judgment of some of society on other members who disagree with that view.
28 A good example is the case of a hypothetical law which would impose criminal 29 sanctions on a woman's posing nude for Playboy Magazine for money. Would such 30 a law be constitutional? How is that different from the present case?

THERE IS NO COMPELLING STATE INTEREST OR EVEN RATIONAL BASIS FOR A TOTAL PROHIBITION OF PRIVATE SEXUAL CONDUCT MERELY BECAUSE MONEY OR OTHER CONSIDERATION IS OFFERED

That one may not be deprived of "life, liberty, or property without due process of law" has traditionally meant that one may not be deprived arbitrarily of the same . . . But if no set principles are used in defining criminal conduct, if criminality is determined solely by undefinable, constantly changing public notions of morality, is this not an arbitrary imposition of punishment and deprivation of liberty without due process of law?

If due process is to have any meaning at all as a check on the police power, its protection must extend to the very heart of the criminal system and first and foremost provide constitutional limits on what conduct may be declared criminal.^{90/}

This aforementioned law review article will be of great assistance in analyzing the constitutionality of Section 647(b). The full article is attached under separate cover as an exhibit and the Court is requested to take judicial notice of it.

Propositions about criminal law may be divided into three categories: Principles, rules, and doctrines. Those which are universally applicable to all crimes are the principles. These principles consist of seven notions: (1) mens rea, (2) act, (3) the concurrence of act and mens rea, (4) harm, (5) causation, (6) punishment, and (7) legality. Except for "punishment" and "legality" these principles refer to essential elements of crime.

The principle of harm has been largely ignored — especially by American jurisprudence. This principle should be one of the primary limitations on the power of the government to make conduct criminal. It should be noted that this principle played an important role in the Pennsylvania Supreme Court's decision to overturn that state's sodomy law.^{91/}

The real purpose of Section 647(b) is to regulate morality. That has traditionally been the purpose of statutes prohibiting sex for hire or "being a common ^{91/} See footnote 86, supra.

1 prostitute." These laws were used almost exclusively against "loose women" regardless 2 of whether or not their promiscuity involved money.

3 The real issue is: When can the government's general authority to regulate 4 public morality (as opposed to private morality) be exercised without transgressing 5 constitutional norms? "The answer should be that morals may be regulated by means 6 of the criminal sanction when, and only when, a breach of the moral code would 7 imminently cause a cognizable harm to a legally protected interest of another."
8 Caughey, "The Principle of Harm, supra, at page 243.

9 If conduct is to be punishable, in order to satisfy due process, it must 10 satisfy the four elements of legal harm: (1) a factually demonstrable (2) invasion of 11 a legally protected interest (3) of another (4) imminently caused by such conduct.

12 The alleged harms associated with private sex for money are: (1) it 13 provides an opportunity for ancillary crimes (i.e., robbery, assault, murder), (2) it 14 encourages organized crime, (3) it is a significant factor in the spread of venereal 15 disease, and (4) it contributes to the destruction of public morals.

16 The following pages will delve into the facts and statistics concerning 17 these alleged harms. Rather than "reinventing the wheel," a portion of Judge Charles 18 Halleck's scholarly opinion will be set forth from the case of United States v. Moses, 19 Superior Court of the District of Columbia, Criminal Division, Case No. 17778-72, 20 filed November 3, 1972. This is one of the finest examinations of the harms associated 21 with prostitution that could be found. The Court should also read the opinion of 22 Judge Margaret Taylor in the case of In re P, supra, which also contains an excellent 23 discourse on this subject. Certain other relevant law review articles are also attached 24 under separate cover and, the Court is requested to take judicial notice of them.^{92/}

An Examination of the "Harms"

VENEREAL DISEASE:

The lore of the harms occasioned by prostitution is as pervasive in our culture as it is unsubstantiated by hard data. Indeed, as Jerome Skolnick has said of this area of legislation, "rather than fact determining policy, policy decides fact."^{93/}

Nowhere does this assessment seem more apposite than in the alleged threat posed to community health by prostitution. Even prescinding from the argument that it is a citizen's right to choose not to protect his own health, we are still cited to nothing which supports the proposition that sexual relations between prostitutes and their clients pose any unique threat to the health and well-being of either party. Over a decade ago, it was remarked in a United Nations publication that "[T]he prostitute ceases to be the major factor in the spread of venereal disease in the United States today."^{94/} This general conclusion has been firmly ratified by knowledgeable physicians and investigators in the field of public health. Because research has so consistently negated the primacy of prostitution in the transmission of venereal disease, and because the popular belief to the contrary is nevertheless held with the tenacity usually invested in notions born of dogma rather than of science, let us pause to consider the evidence.

Following her comprehensive study of prostitution in Seattle, Professor Jennifer James of the University of Washington School of Medicine observed that:

Public Health advisors believe that prostitutes are well-educated about venereal disease problems and are watchful for them. They are aware of preventive techniques which include using prophylactics, checking customers, and seeking medical care, because a reputation as one who is infected would cut down the relatively large volume of repeat business which most prostitutes depend on.^{95/}

Dr. James further remarks, in a conclusion shared by many of her colleagues that "Public Health advisors believe that the increase in venereal disease is related more to a general change in sexual values unaccompanied by health education . . ."^{96/}

^{96/} "Prostitution in Seattle," supra, at 8.

1 Dr. William M. Edwards, Jr., Chief of the Bureau of Preventive Medicine, Nevada 2 State Health Division, recently concurred in this view, saying:

3 The problem isn't in the house of prostitution; it's out in the general 4 population . . . Prostitutes are much more alert to the possibilities of 5 infection and get examined very frequently.^{97/}

6 Dr. Edwards further indicated that the venereal disease rate among prostitutes 7 is less than five percent (5%), while among high school students age 15-19, the rate 8 is twenty five percent (25%). Dr. R. Palmer Beasley of the University of Washington 9 School of Public Health and Community Medicine similarly averred that "(m)ost 10 venereal disease spread is not between prostitutes and their customers. Probably 11 ninety percent (90%) of venereal disease is unrelated to prostitution." Dr. Charles 12 Winick of C.C.N.Y. and the American Social Health Association, co-author of The 13 Lively Commerce (New York, 1972), was even more conservative in his estimate:

14 We know from many different studies that the amount of venereal 15 disease attributable to prostitution is remaining fairly constant at a little 16 under five percent (5%), which is a negligible proportion compared to the 17 amount of venereal disease that we have.^{98/}

18 Statistics promulgated by the Public Health Service of the United States 19 Department of Health, Education and Welfare further document the minor role of 20 prostitution in spreading venereal disease:

21 In the United States during the 12-month period ending June 30, 22 1971, less than three percent (3%) of more than 13,600 females diagnosed 23 with infectious syphilis were prostitutes.^{99/}

24 In Seattle during the three-year period preceding 1971, during which time 25 all women arrested as prostitutes were medically examined, no more than one or 26 two of hundreds were found to have infectious syphilis and fewer than six percent 27 (6%) were infected with gonorrhea.^{100/} Meanwhile, the gonorrhea rate increased 28 fivefold among residents of Prince George's County, Maryland, in the last decade; 29 and quadrupled in Arlington, Virginia, between 1969-1970 alone.^{101/}

35 Disease Control, Atlanta Georgia.

36 ^{100/} "Prostitution in Seattle," supra, at 8.

^{101/} Newsweek, January 24, 1972, at 46.

1 The viewpoint of the experts may easily be corroborated inferentially; for 2 while the highest rate of venereal disease exists in the age group 15-30 (comprising 3 eighty-four percent (84%) of all reported venereal disease cases), the age group 4 which most frequents prostitutes is 30-60 (seventy percent (70%) of "johns" in Seattle).^{102/} 5 Nor is this age pattern for prostitutes' clientele by any means peculiar to Seattle, 6 as other portraits of typical patrons will readily attest.^{103/} As Robert M. Nellis of 7 the San Francisco City Clinic succinctly put it: "Prostitution is not where it's at 8 with V.D. today; it's Johnny next door and Susie up the street."^{104/,105/}

9 Even were this Court persuaded that prostitution is a major source of the 10 proliferation of venereal disease, it is patently clear that this harm could be controlled 11 by a more narrowly drawn statute, one not abridging privacy and personal liberties 12 as does a total prohibition. . . . Other nations have long had schemes requiring 13 prostitutes to register with health authorities, to have regular medical examination, 14 or to comply with other health regulations. In most of the counties of Nevada 15 prostitution is legal in state-licensed houses with provision for medical maintenance.
16 It is not this Court's purpose to encourage prostitution nor to advocate any such 17 scheme of regulation; it is sufficient to note that whatever state interest is entailed 18 here can adequately be protected by means short of prohibition of soliciting and the 19 attendant deprivation of constitutional rights.^{106/} In light of the foregoing, the 20 hypothetical public health rationale must fail.

21 ^{102/} "Prostitution in Seattle," supra, at 8.

22 ^{103/} See, e.g., Harry Benjamin, M.D., and R.E.L. Masters, Prostitution and Morality, (1964); Winick and Kinsie, The Lively Commerce, (1972).

23 ^{104/} Newsweek, January 24, 1972, at 46.

24 ^{105/} The progress of medical research in the development of prophylactic 25 drugs for venereal disease deserves at least passing comment here. While some degree 26 of effective venereal disease prophylaxis can be achieved by regular weekly injections 27 of penicillin, as has been done for some years now in certain foreign countries which 28 medically regulate prostitutes (see, e.g., 13 International Review of Criminal Policy, 29 supra) A.S.H.A.-sponsored experiments in Nevada testing a new compound Progonasyl, 30 have had extremely optimistic results. Prophylactic use of the drug (which is also 31 an effective contraceptive) by prostitutes in the State-licensed houses of prostitution 32 resulted in a "significant reduction" of the venereal disease rates, especially for 33 gonorrhea, by far the more common disease. ("A Study of Progonasyl Using Prostitution 34 in Nevada's Legal Houses of Prostitution," W.M. Edwards, M.D., Chief, Bureau of 35 Preventive Medicine, Nevada State Health Division, and Richard S. Fox, April 13, 1972).

36 Thus, whatever state interest may be said to reside in controlling prostitution for the purpose of diminishing venereal disease may soon be eliminated.

^{106/} "The consensus of opinion in this matter seems to have been best stated by Flexner in 1914 who said (in his classic work Prostitution in Europe) that the treating

1 ORGANIZED CRIME:

2 It is important to consider another potential government allegation, not 3 here made but frequently advanced, and also wholly unsupported by any evidence in 4 these cases, that banning solicitation can be constitutionally justified because prostitu-5 tion is often linked with organized crime. Again we confront a proposition whose 6 popular acceptance has survived long after the actual conditions which it may once 7 have described. The Presidential Task Force Report on Organized Crime addresses 8 itself directly to this question:

9 Prostitution . . . plays a small and declining role in organized crime's 10 operations . . . Prostitution is difficult to organize, and discipline is hard 11 to maintain. Several important convictions of organized crime figures in 12 prostitution cases in the 1930's and 1940's made the criminal executives 13 wary of further participation.^{107/}

14 Other writers in the field accord with this view. Dr. Charles Winick 15 observes that ". . . nowadays prostitution . . . is too visible an activity for organized 16 crime — it's too dangerous. Therefore, organized crime has pretty much gotten out 17 of the prostitution business."^{108/} As another scholar added, ". . . organized crime 18 has more lucrative and less perilous enterprises available to it."^{109/} These views 19 were reiterated within the particular context of the District of Columbia by Lieutenant 20 Charles Rinaldi in an interview conducted while he was chief of the Morals Division 21 of the District of Columbia Metropolitan Police:

22 There is no real organization of call girls here in Washington.
23 Maybe there's a loose network, but only infrequently do you find one 24 pimp with a couple of girls working for him. The Mafia isn't around here 25 Anyway, prostitution just isn't profitable enough in Washington to 26 keep any organization interested.^{110/}

27 The San Francisco Committee on Crime injects another dimension to the 28 analysis:

29 It is also probable that if prostitution were not a crime, it would 30 not be organized. In any event, a law enforcement policy of sweeping

1 prostitutes off the streets and into our courts is no way to keep organized 2 crime out of prostitution.^{111/}

3 The Committee is presumably alluding to the need for structure and 4 organization generated by the efforts necessary to elude detection and combat legal 5 prosecution. In such a situation, otherwise private entrepreneurs are forced toward 6 alliances with underworld syndicates for "protection," while the attendant occasion 7 for police corruption grows in ominous proportion.

8 Another important perspective on the problem is suggested by Professor 9 Kingsley Davis:

10 Prostitution has probably declined as underworld business in America; 11 not only have demand and supply slackened, but other activities, such as 12 labor-union control, have proved immensely profitable and easier to organize.¹¹

13 While this Court naturally expresses no view on the relationship of organized 14 crime with organized labor, it is a conceivable affiliation no less logically plausible 15 than that of organized crime and prostitution. However, one would expect to find 16 few serious proponents of the abolition of labor unions in order to prevent their 17 potential domination by criminal syndicates. Courts have, in fact, long held that 18 society should regulate illegal conduct directly, rather than prohibit other activities 19 on the ground that those activities are somehow, in some cases, connected with 20 illegality. Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville, 405 U.S. 156 (1972); Stanley v. Georgia, 21 394 U.S. 557 (1969).

22 Accordingly, even if prostitution were closely connected to organized 23 crime, which a careful investigation demonstrates is not the case in this jurisdiction, 24 this Court could not properly support an absolute prohibition of constitutionally 25 protected conduct in order indirectly to suppress proscribed activity. This rationale 26 too must fail.

27 ANCILLARY CRIMES:

28 Closely allied with the foregoing alleged state interest in prohibiting 29 solicitation of prostitution is the endeavor to inhibit crimes which may somehow be 30 ancillary to prostitution. By restricting prostitution, so the theory goes, one may 31 also minimize the occurrence of related crimes against the person or property of 32 either consenting party. While the logic of this analysis seems sound, the evidence

1 is less than conclusive.

2 The Seattle study remarks bluntly that:

3 . . . [P]rohibition of prostitution itself causes crime. . . . The prohibition 4 . . . has a double impact. To the extent that prostitutes believe their 5 victims will not report a robbery or theft they will be encouraged to 6 commit it. Further, prostitutes, more than occasional victims of assaults 7 by customers,^{113/} are also discouraged from involving the law.^{114/} (Footnote 8 supplied.)

10 Thus attachment of the stigma and penalties of the criminal law to basically 11 innocuous sensual conduct may actually deter application of such sanctions to genuinely 12 harmful behavior.

13 Nor is the alternative simply resignation to the criminal activity which 14 may arise in conjunction with prostitution any more than to the crime which may be 15 ancillary to the vending of goods or the practice of law. The San Francisco Committee 16 on Crime was admirably direct in meeting this issue:

17 Bearing in mind the financial limits on public resources available 18 to combat crime, this is a poor area to apply "consumer protection" 19 against the consumer's own gullibility. The answer to prostitution-connected 20 force, violence, or theft is that it is chargeable and punishable as a 21 separate crime, independent of any act or solicitation of prostitution.^{115/}

22 Stated most baldly, "[I]f prostitutes or pimps rob or beat patrons, the 23 victims should charge robbery or bodily harm, not prostitution."^{116/} It goes without 24 saying that the prostitutes should also be free to charge robbery or bodily harm 25 against patrons; they ought not to be deprived of protection of life and property 26 simply because of their chosen "profession."

27 Furthermore, it is not clear that crimes commonly associated with prostitu-28 tion are primarily attributable to the prostitutes themselves. The San Francisco 29 Committee on Crime rejects such a notion, saying:

30 ^{113/} A major study of prostitutes in Seattle during 1970-71, using statistically 31 valid sampling techniques, revealed that more than seventy-six percent (76.1%) of all 32 female prostitutes were injured while working; sixty-four percent (64%) of these by 33 customers, twenty percent (20%) by police, and sixteen percent (16%) by pimps. Dr.

I-B (Department of Psychiatry, School of Medicine, University of Washington, 1971).

Crime in San Francisco," supra, at 29.

^{116/} "The Politics of Prostitution," The Nation (April 10, 1972) at 463.

1 [I]n short, society's effort to prevent crimes of violence associated 2 with prostitution would be more effective by concentrating law enforcement 3 efforts on the pimps rather than on the girls, on the "associated crimes" 4 rather than prostitution.^{117/}

5 Nor does a proscription of soliciting indirectly accomplish control of 6 the pimps; on the contrary, the intrusion of the criminal law greatly augments the 7 typical prostitute's need for a pimp and his corresponding power to author wrongdoing.

8 If the evidence in this area of inquiry is less than conclusive, the law is 9 not. To arrest and criminally prosecute a prostitute because of a possibility that 10 crime-related activity might be involved directly or indirectly is massively antithetical 11 to traditional concepts of due process, equal protection, and individual liberty. The 12 Supreme Court recently voided a Florida vagrancy statute which made similar assumption 13 about the criminal propensities of certain classes of people. In Papachristou v. City 14 of Jacksonville, supra, Justice Douglas wrote for a unanimous Court:

15 A presumption that people who might walk or loaf or loiter or 16 stroll or frequent houses where liquor is sold, or who are supported by 17 their wives or who look suspicious to the police are to become future 18 criminals is too precarious for a rule of law. The implicit presumption in 19 these generalized vagrancy standards — that crime is being nipped in the 20 bud — is too extravagant to deserve extended treatment. Of course, they 21 are nets making easy the round-up of so-called undesirables. But the rule 22 of law implies equality and justice in its application. Vagrancy laws of 23 the Jacksonville type teach that the scales of justice are so tipped that 24 even-handed administration of the law is not possible. The rule of law, 25 evenly applied to minorities as well as majorities, to the poor as well as 26 to the rich, is the great mucilage that holds society together. 405 U.S.
27 at 171.

28 Within a context of the right to privacy and First Amendment freedoms, 29 the Court in Stanley v. Georgia, supra, reached an analogous conclusion concerning 30 prohibition of protected behavior to prevent possible related harms. A state:

31 . . . may no more prohibit mere possession of obscenity on the 32 ground that it may lead to anti-social conduct than it may prohibit the 33 possession of chemistry books on the ground that they may lead to the 34 manufacture of homemade spirits. 394 U.S. at 565.

35 ^{117/} "The San Francisco Committee on Crime: A Report on Non-Victim 36 Crime in San Francisco," supra, at 29.

1 If indeed there is evidence that prostitution is sometimes coincident with 2 certain crimes, there is also ample indication that the extension of the criminal law 3 to soliciting significantly hinders application of legal sanctions to those very crimes.
4 By the most fundamental precepts of our law, it is to those violent acts that such 5 sanctions must directly be addressed. Endorsement of an alleged state interest 6 which precisely inverts this proscriptive emphasis would be a perversion of justice in 7 which this Court will not acquiesce. The rationale fails with its predecessors. . . .

8 PUBLIC MORALITY:

9 The inordinate overextension of this statute, so disproportional with any 10 of the potential evils occasioned by solicitation for prostitution, contributes to the 11 inevitable deduction that the government's primary concern here is to suppress prostitu-12 tion because it is "immoral." Having reached what this Court believes to be the 13 central, if tacit, state interest in these cases, it must now consider the broad question 14 of the right of secular government to regulate public morality.

15 The government contends that the state has the obligation and right to 16 encourage upright and moral behavior on the part of its citizens. Prescinding from 17 the obvious dilemma of choosing which of a host of conflicting ethical theories to 18 promulgate (and who is to make the choice), affirmation of governmental power to 19 legislate morals is fraught with hazards. Upon the acceptance of such a view, the 20 state may ultimately be given the right to regulate everything. Indeed, there is 21 little human conduct that could not be invested with moral implications; thus the 22 sphere of permissible state regulation could soon devour all personal liberties in the 23 name of community morality. But who shall be the final arbiter — Billy Graham or 24 Billy Sunday, Carl McIntyre or Karl Marx? This Court is convinced that the proper 25 perspective on regulation of public morals was enunciated by the well-known Wolfenden 26 Report:

27 Unless a deliberate attempt is to be made by society, acting through 28 the agency of the law, to equate the sphere of crime with that of sin, 29 there must remain a realm of private morality and immorality which is, 30 in brief and cruder terms, not the law's business.^{118/}

31 The equivalence of crime with sin is surely not tenable in light of the 32 privacy doctrine which we have been discussing. If the right to privacy has any 33 viable meaning, it cannot be defeated by a mere assertion that the state has the 34 right to regulate "immoral" conduct even though that conduct is not shown to hurt

35 ^{118/} Committee on Homosexual Offenses and Prostitution, Report, CMD.
36 No. 247 (London, 1957) at 24.

1 anyone. The advocacy of ethical theories is not synonymous with the demonstration 2 of concrete societal harms. This Court concurs with Mill and Hart in insisting that 3 it is only the latter which would justify a court's finding of an evil sufficient to 4 warrant dilution of liberties. "So long as others are not harmed, we . . . justly 5 deserve freedom, even the freedom to be immoral."^{119/} Upon thorough examination 6 of the evidence pertinent to state claims (both stated and implied) of the harms 7 caused by prostitution, the Court is satisfied that they are spurious. The only injury 8 which actually is traceable to consensual acts of prostitution between adults is the 9 sense of indignation spawned in certain other persons. This so-called harm is not of 10 an order cognizable by the law. Absent showing of a concrete evil that government 11 has a right to prevent, prostitution, like other consensual sexual activity, is not a fit 12 matter for proscriptive legislation. The Court agrees that "sexual acts or activities 13 accomplished without violence, constraint, or fraud, should find no place in our penal 14 codes."^{120/} Soliciting for prostitution in the District of Columbia is such an uninjuri-15 ous activity; this perception, coupled with the constitutional rights here at stake, 16 precludes the criminalization of this verbal behavior demanded by Section 2701.

17 It must also be observed that criminalization of "immoral" behavior collides 18 with other difficulties in its drive to eradicate the universe of undesirable conduct:

19 The criminal code of any jurisdiction tends to make a crime of 20 everything that people are against, without regard to enforceability, changing 21 social concepts, etc. The result is that the criminal code becomes 22 society's trash bin. The police have to rummage around in this material 23 and are expected to prevent everything that is unlawful. They cannot do 24 so because many of the things prohibited are simply beyond enforcement.
25 ^{121/}

26 This Court is reminded of the estimate by Kinsey and his associates that 27 were all laws concerning sex crimes rigidly enforced, ninety-five percent (95%) of 28 the male population would at one time or another be in a penal institution.^{122/} To

1 attempt thoroughgoing enforcement of the ban on soliciting prostitution in the District 2 of Columbia would be an enterprise almost equally ambitious, costly, and impracticable.
3 The Court is further convinced that evidence cannot be adduced to show that enforce-4 ment efforts under Section 2701 make any significant progress toward the elimination 5 of solicitation for prostitution in this city. Naturally, it transcends the Court's 6 province to make legislative determinations. The Court ventures these explorations 7 simply to suggest the great morass of problems which one encounters in that attempt 8 to regulate an area so broad and nebulous as public morals. For present purposes it 9 suffices to examine the impact of such regulatory efforts upon the exercise of constitutio 10 rights.

11 This Court finds that a generalized belief that certain conduct is immoral 12 is no substitute for showing of governmentally cognizable harms caused by that 13 conduct. Solicitation for prostitution may be activity that some, even many, in this 14 community find morally reprehensible. Nonetheless, absent any demonstrated tangible 15 harms emanating from this activity, particularly none sufficiently compelling to 16 justify an abridgement of the fundamental rights involved here, the Court concludes 17 that Section 22-22701 is invalid as an unconstitutional invasion of defendants' rights 18 of privacy and free speech. From U.S. v. Moses, supra.

SECTION 647(b) IS UNCONSTITUTIONALLY VAGUE
BECAUSE THE DEFINITION OF THE CRIME
RESTS ON THE MEANING OF SUCH TERMS AS "ANY LEWD ACT" AND
"OR OTHER CONSIDERATION"

The only published California appellate decision specifically defining the term "lewd" as used in section 647, subdivision (b), is the case of People v. Norris, supra. In that case the Appellate Department of the Los Angeles Superior Court, relying upon People v. Williams, (1976) 59 Cal.App.3d 225, 229, held that it was proper to define that term as meaning "lustfull, lascivious, unchaste, wanton, or loose in morals and conduct." See People v. Norris, supra, at 88 Cal.App.Supp.3d 40.

There can be no question that such holding by the court in Norris has been called into question, if not impliedly overruled, by the Court of Appeal decision in People v. Hill, supra. The court in Hill recognized that such a definition would be unconstitutionally vague in view of the recent California Supreme Court ruling in Pryor v. Municipal Court, supra, which reinterpreted section 647, subdivision (a).

With respect to the definition of the term "prostitution" as used in California's pimping and pandering statutes, the court in Hill stated that the term "prostitution" must be limited "as meaning sexual intercourse between persons for money or other considerations and only those 'lewd and dissolute' acts between persons for money or other consideration as set forth in the Pryor case." Hill, supra, at page 105.

When one turns to the Pryor case for the definition of the term "lewd" one finds the holding of the California Supreme Court crystal clear. The Supreme Court states:

The terms "lewd" and "dissolute" in this section are synonomous and refer to conduct which involves the touching of the genitals, buttocks or female breast for the purpose of sexual arousal, gratification, annoyance or offense, if the actor knows or should know of the presence of persons who may be offended by his conduct. Pryor, supra, 158 Cal.Rptr. 330 at 341.

After the Pryor decision was handed down by the California Supreme Court and before that decision was final, the Los Angeles City Attorney filed a petition for modification of the court's opinion. (See Exhibit submitted along with

1 this brief which contains that Petition and the Order of the Supreme Court denying 2 the application for modification.) In that Petition to Modify the City Attorney 3 stated:

4 Although the opinion clearly states that the definition of the terms 5 "lewd" and "dissolute" set forth apply only to section 647(a), the phrasing 6 of that definition on page 26 of the slip opinion may cause substantial 7 confusion. The last clause of that definition seemingly limits the terms 8 "lewd" to refer only to acts performed when "the actor knows or should 9 have known of the presence of persons who may be offended by his conduct." 10 It can be expected that an attempt will be made to apply this definition 11 to other statutes employing the term "lewd", such as Penal Code Section 12 647(b), (prostitution) . . . Pryor, supra, "Petition for Modification of 13 Opinion" at pages 5-6.

14 The Los Angeles City Attorney requested the Supreme Court to detach 15 the clause "if the actor knows or should know of the presence of persons who may 16 be offended by his conduct" from the definition of "lewd" and instead attach it to 17 the definition of "public place". The Supreme Court, on August 29, 1979, entered an 18 Order Denying the Application for Modification.

19 The case of People v. Hill, supra, did not clarify, whether the term 20 "prostitution", insofar as it uses the term "lewd", would include a requirement that 21 the defendant knows or should know of the presence of persons who may be offended 22 before the prohibited conduct is considered "lewd" within the meaning of the prostitu-23 tion statute.

24 Many of the trial courts throughout California have adopted a definition 25 of prostitution for purposes of section 647(b) which limits that definition to conduct 26 between two persons which involves the touching of the genitals, buttocks, or female 27 breasts for purposes of sexual arousal, gratification, annoyance, or offense. This 28 approach ignores the Supreme Court's mandate that sexual conduct is not to be 29 considered "lewd" absent an additional showing that the "actor knows or should know 30 of the presence of persons who may be offended."

31 The Appellate Department of the San Diego Superior Court, in an unpublished 32 opinion, has adopted a definition of the term "prostitution" within section 647, sub-33 division (b) such that the prosecution need not prove that the ultimate conduct to be 34 performed would be such that the "actor knows or should know of the presence of 35 persons who may be offended." In the case of People v. Fitzgerald, Superior Court 36 No. CR 47640, filed November 13, 1979, (a copy of which is submitted under separate

1 cover as an Exhibit), the court held that "section 647(b) only precludes solicitation 2 of, or engaging in, a sexually motivated act (touching of the genitals, buttocks, or 3 female breasts for the purpose of sexual arousal or gratification for money or other 4 consideration), and does not require knowledge of the presence of persons who may 5 be offended thereby or that a public place or view be involved." Fitzgerald, supra, 6 at page 3 of slip opinion. However, that decision was not unanimous. In his dissenting 7 opinion, Superior Court Judge Byron F. Lindsley, stated:

8 I disagree with the majority. While Pryor v. Municipal Court, (1979) 9 25 Cal.3d 238, expressly applied to 647(a) only because that was the 10 section there involved, I think Appellant is correct in arguing that Pryor 11 also applies to 647(b) as it was involved in this case. While there is a 12 code subsection distinction between the two cases, I believe that it is a 13 distinction without a difference when we give heed to philisophical substance 14 of Pryor and its follow-up case In re Anders, 25 Cal.3d 414 (October 4, 15 1979). The opinion in Anders, also written by Justice Tobriner, states: 16 "We construe the statute to prohibit only the solicitation or commission 17 of conduct in a public place or one open to the public or exposed to 18 public view, which involves the touching of the genitals, buttocks, or 19 female breasts, for purposes of sexual arousal, gratification, annoyance or 20 offense, by a person who knows or should know of the presences of persons 21 who may be offended by the conduct."

22 I believe this same construction for the same reasons must attach to 23 647(b) or its meaning it lost.

24 Pryor and now Anders have pointed the law and its administration 25 toward a new, more rational and reasonable result in this most widely 26 confused and applied area of the law at the point of enforcement. The 27 majority erode the banks of the stream before the law has had a chance 28 to flow within its new bounds." Fitzgerald, supra, at pages 3 & 4 of the 29 slip opinion.

30 Although Mr. Fitzgerald did not receive the benefit of the full definition 31 of "lewd" as set forth by the California Supreme Court in the Pryor decision, other 32 defendants have not been so unfortunate. In the case of People v. Michele Sotello, 33 Los Angeles Municipal Court Case No. 625374, decided June 6, 1980, Municipal Court 34 Judge Paul I. Metzler, issued the following order overruling a demurrer and constitu-35 tionally construing the statute (a copy of which order is attached under separate 36 cover as an Exhibit):

1 After having considered all of the oral and written arguments presented 2 by counsel for the respective parties — Jay M. Kohorn for the defendant, 3 and Byron Boeckman, Deputy City Attorney, for the People — at the 4 hearing on the demurrer on June 6, 1980, at 1:00 pm, in Division 104, in 5 the above-entitled case:

6 IT IS HEREBY ORDERED that the demurrer be and the same is 7 hereby overruled based upon the fact that Penal Code Section 647, sub-8 division (b) is not unconstitutional as interpreted herein. The term "lewd" 9 must be defined as the Supreme Court defined that term in the case of 10 Pryor v. Municipal Court (25 Cal.3d 238, 158 Cal.Rptr. 330), which case 11 constitutionally construed Penal Code Section 647, subdivision (a): the 12 term 'lewd' refers to conduct "which involves the touching of the genitals, 13 buttocks, or female breast for the purpose of sexual arousal, gratification, 14 annoyance or offense, if the actor knows or should know of the presence 15 of persons who may be offended by his conduct."

16 Thus P.C. section 647(b) would conform to the general scheme of 17 the entire Disorderly Conduct statute (P.C. section 647) in that public 18 offensiveness would be required. The statute would thus also conform to 19 the requirement that the same word used throughout the section be defined 20 in the same manner regardless of which subdivision it appears in, throughout 21 section 647, in order to give reasonable notice to the public as to what 22 conduct is prescribed by the statute.

23 This order shall constitute the law of the case.

24 As a result of this ruling the City Attorney determined that it could not 25 prove its case because of leading behavior of the undercover vice officer toward the 26 defendant, and because there were no other members of the public present to be 27 offended and as a result the City Attorney made a motion to dismiss the complaint 28 against the defendant, which motion was accepted by Judge Metzler.

29 The California constitution requires that laws of a general nature be 30 uniform in operation. Also the California constitution requires that persons similarly 31 situated not be invidiously discriminated against. Furthermore due process requires 32 that the defendant be on notice as to what definition of the crime will be submitted 33 to the jury so that he may prepare for his defense. Each of these rules is violated 34 when one defendant is getting the benefit of the full definition of "lewd" as set 35 forth in the Pryor case while other defendants are being prosecuted and tried under 36 less complete definitions with less restrictions attached.

1 Petitioner in the instant case, as well as all other defendants who have 2 joined in this petition for a writ, are at a loss as to which definition of "prostitution" 3 or which definition of "lewd" as used in section 647, subdivision (b), will be given to 4 the jury when they face trial. Obviously, some judges require the additional showing 5 that the "actor knows or should know of the presence of persons who may be offended" 6 and other judges do not. This issue, i.e., what definition of "lewd" must be used for 7 purposes of section 647, subdivision (b) in order to satisfy constitutional requirements, 8 must be decided before petitioner faces trial. Otherwise his rights to equal protection, 9 due process, and uniformity of operation of the law are all being violated. This 10 court, and ultimately an appellate court of state-wide jurisdiction, must decide this 11 issue in a published opinion. As a result of such a ruling, all persons being prosecuted 12 under section 647, subdivision (b) will be treated in the same manner by the trial 13 courts, will be judged by the same standards by the juries and will all be on notice 14 as to how to prepare their defense. Until such time as a ruling on this issue is 15 forthcoming from a court of state-wide jurisdiction, petitioner and others similarly 16 situated may not receive a fair trial.

17 The gravamen of the offense actually rests on a manifestation of intent 18 to include some consideration in the agreement to have sex. Consideration need 19 not take the form of an actual cash flow, and Section 647(b) recognizes this by 20 referring to "money or other consideration." "Consideration" can extend all the 21 way from large sums of cash to the smallest token of personal affection or favor.
22 As Professor David Richards has observed, ". . . [T]here is not always a sharp line, 23 perhaps, between the dinners and entertainment expenses in now conventional pre-24 marital sexual relations and the more formalized business transactions of the prostitute.¹²⁴

25 In making money or other consideration the "triggering" factor in deter-26 mining criminality, the statute severely infringes on the fundamental rights of persons 27 to engage in activities which, because they are so private and intimate in character, 28 should be deemed beyond the reach of the criminal law. Take, for instance, the 29 kind of arrangement which is not unknown among certain ethnic groups, whereby a 30 married couple, one of whose members is infertile, requests a third person to have 31 a baby by the fertile member or by a willing, fertile outsider, so that the couple 32 can adopt it. Under Section 647(b), the couple could be prosecuted for prostitution.^{124/} 35 op. cit., pp. 1205-1206 (see footnote 30, supra).

1 Again, consider the case of hitch-hikers. Hitch hiking, which is an endemic 2 characteristic of our automobile age, often has wide-spread sexual overtones. There 3 have been cases in which arrests have resulted under Section 647(b) when a suggestion 4 was made that sex could be compensation for a ride to a specific location.^{125/}

5 The problem of paying for certain types of sexual therapy have already 6 been explored in depth.^{126/} It should be noted that failure to prosecute does not 7 immunize citizens from the infirmities of being arrested and put through the criminal 8 processes at the whim or specific moral judgment of police officers. Additionally, 9 such overbroad statutory language results in the evils of a type of "prior restraint" 10 by citizens to avoid activity which is within their constitutional rights and perogatives.

11 In sum, the term consideration must be examined with exceptional care 12 and precision in order to construe it in a limited and constitutionally narrow fashion.

THE SOLICITATION PORTION OF SECTION 647(b)
VIOLATES THE FREE SPEECH PROTECTIONS OF THE FIRST AMENDMENT TO THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION AND ARTICLE I, SECTION 2 OF THE CALIFORNIA CONSTITUTION

As articulated in the foregoing sections of this brief, private sexual conduct between consenting adults or the personal decision to engage in such conduct is constitutionally protected. This is true, even though money or other consideration may be offered or exchanged between the parties to the sex act. Also previously discussed is the fact that the engaging portion of this statute is unconstitutional on its face because it violates the right to privacy, the right to due process of law as guaranteed by both the State and Federal Constitutions, and is constitutionally overbroad.

Because the engaging portion of the statute is unconstitutional, the solicitation portion prohibits requests to commit many forms of lawful sexual conduct. We need not, therefore, be concerned here with the longstanding rule that the state may prohibit "solicitation to commit a crime."

Before delving into specific defects in the solicitation portion of this statute, a review of basic constitutional principles of free speech is in order.

"The constitutional guarantees of freedom of speech forbid the States to punish the use of words or language not within 'narrowly limited classes of speech.' Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568, 571, 62 S.Ct. 766, 760, 86 L.Ed. 1031 (1942). Even as to such a class, however, because 'the line between speech unconditionally guaranteed and speech which may be legitimately regulated, suppressed, or punished is finely drawn,' (citation omitted) "[i]n every case the power to regulate must be so exercised as not, in attaining a permissible end, unduly to infringe the protected freedom.' (Citation omitted.) In other words, the statute must be carefully drawn or be authoritatively construed to punish only unprotected speech and not be susceptible of application to protected expression. 'Because First Amendment freedoms need breathing space to survive, government may regulate in the area only with narrow specificity.'" Gooding v. Wilson (1972) 92 S.Ct. 1103, 1106.

What are those "narrowly limited classes of speech" which the state has the right to suppress? They include "the lewd and obscene, the profane, the libelous, and the insulting or 'fighting' words -- those which by their very utterance inflict

1 injury or tend to incite an immediate breach of the peace." Chaplinsky, supra, at p.
2 572. These are the limited classes of speech which the state has the right to punish 3 because of their content.

4 With respect to prohibiting the content of certain classes of speech:

5 The question in every case is whether the words are used in such 6 circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present 7 danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has 8 a right to prevent. Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969) 395 U.S. 415, 429.

9 The argument that speech is stripped of its First Amendment protection 10 because it is "commercial" was answered a few years ago by the United States 11 Supreme Court:

12 The State was not free of constitutional restraint merely because 13 the advertisement involves sales or "solicitations," (citations omitted) or 14 because appellant was paid for printing it, (citations omitted) or because 15 appellant's motive or the motive of the advertiser may have involved 16 financial gain (citations omitted). The existence of "commercial activity, 17 in itself, is no justification for narrowing the protection of expression 18 secured by the First Amendment." Bigelow v. Virginia (1975) 95 S.Ct.
19 2222, 2231.

20 In the Bigelow case the Court noted that it had, in an earlier case, made 21 a holding which appeared to strip commercial speech of all constitutional protections, 22 and thus this doctrine had crept into constitutional law. In the case of Valentine v.
23 Crestensen (1942) 62 S.Ct. 920, 921, the Supreme Court had said, "We are equally 24 clear the the Constitution imposes no such restraint on government as respects 25 purely commercial advertising." In Bigelow the Court explained that holding:

26 But the holding is a distinctly limited one: the ordinance was upheld 27 as a reasonable regulation of the manner in which commercial advertising 28 could be distributed The case obviously does not support any 29 sweeping proposition that advertising is unprotected per se. Bigelow, at 30 p. 2231.

31 Before surveying cases involving the free speech clause of the California 32 constitution, caution should be taken that:

33 Regardless of the particular label asserted by the State — whether 34 it calls the speech "commercial" or "solicitation" — a court may not 35 escape the task of assessing the First Amendment interest at stake and 36 weigh it against the public interest allegedly served by the regulation.

1 Bigelow, at 2235.

2 Article I, section 2 of the California constitution reads: "Every person 3 may freely speak, write and publish his or her sentiments on all subjects, being 4 responsible for the abuse of this right. A law may not restrain or abridge liberty of 5 speech or press." The California Supreme Court recognized in Robins v. Pruneyard 6 Shopping Center (1979) 23 Cal.3d 899, 909, that the free speech clause of the California 7 constitution provides more protection against the regulation of speech than does the 8 First Amendment:

9 Though the Framers could have adopted the words of the Federal 10 Bill of Rights, they chose not to do so "[A] protective provision 11 more definitive and inclusive than the First Amendment is contained in 12 our state constitutional guarantee of the right of free speech and press."

13 The California Supreme Court, in People v. Fogelson (1978) 21 Cal.3d 158, 14 165, held that "distinctly commercial forms of solicitation" are entitled to constitu-15 tional protection. The Court has often made distinctions between prohibition of 16 speech because of its content and reasonable regulations of time, place, and manner.

17 The fact that speech involves motivations of "profit" does not dilute 18 protections against regulation of content. Burton v. Municipal Court (1968) 68 Cal.Rptr.
19 721, 724. However, this basic principle does not bestow upon one engaged in a 20 commercial activity "gratuitous immunity from all restraint in the pursuit of his 21 occupation. A municipality may impose reasonable regulations upon the conduct of a 22 business enterprise." Burton, supra, at 724.

23 If a California appellate court could construe the solicitation portion of 24 section 647(b) in a way that would transform it from an unconstitutional restraint on 25 the content of speech and into a reasonable regulation of time, place, and manner 26 of solicitation, the free speech problems could be cured.

27 The state may, for example, reasonably regulate time, place, and 28 manner of engaging in solicitation in public places. (Citations omitted.)
29 The state may also reasonably and narrowly regulate solicitations in order 30 to prevent fraud, (citation omitted) or to prevent undue harassment of 31 passersby or interference with the business operations being conducted on 32 the property. Fogelson, supra, at 165.

33 The comments which follow are those of Judge Margaret Taylor, of the 34 Civil Court in New York, author of the decision in In re P., supra, submitted herewith 35 as an exhibit. The comments were made in a talk on the problems of prostitution, 36 before the annual conference of the National Committee for Sexual Civil Liberties,

1 held in Washington, D.C., on May 24, 1980, and explore the street problems relating 2 to solicitation by prostitutes.

3 If we can clarify our attitudes about prostitutes, then I believe we 4 will have reached a new plateau in our attitudes towards females in 5 general. If we ultimately accept women as humans who are entitled to 6 the same rights, respect and opportunities as men, then we will be able 7 to deal honestly with prostitution (or will we have to start with prostitutes 8 first?).

9 * * * *

10 When prostitutes can have unemployment compensation, workmen's 11 compensation, social security, labor unions, child labor law protection, 12 health and safety protections on the job, then I will believe that the 13 restrictions sought to be imposed on prostitutes are solely because of 14 actual incidents of disorderly conduct or harrassment to non-consenting 15 persons by particular prostitutes rather than a desire merely to punish 16 "bad" women.

17 * * * *

18 The street problem in New York City is a serious one, particularly 19 as it relates to what you can sell and do on the public sidewalks, whether 20 it is selling products (e.g., flowers, books, items of clothing) or services 21 (e.g., magicians, musicians, prostitutes) or merely "hanging out" (e.g., 22 drunks, loud teenagers shouting obscenities, sleepers).

23 Of all these groups using the sidewalks, only the prostitutes are 24 arrested, fingerprinted, put in detention pens for 24 to 48 hours, convicted, 25 fined and jailed. None of the other street sellers and users are so abused 26 and degraded and given lifetime stigmatizing records.

27 I can assure you that many people in New York City are upset 28 about the extent and nature of sidewalk activity. Storeowners are angry 29 about peddlers selling products on the sidewalks immediately in front of 30 the doors of their stores. A composer who lived for many years across 31 the street from Carnegie Hall finds it almost impossible to compose 32 because of the daily off-key violin playing for money which goes on for 33 hours every day in front of Carnegie Hall. I saw a woman in tears pleading 34 in vain with a group of street musicians to stop playing. She pointed out 35 to the uncomprehending pedestrians (who thought the musicians were fun 36 and cute) that she was no longer able to enjoy her apartment on the

1 second floor because the same musicians played the same five songs under 2 her window for hours every night. Some homeowners in Greenwich Village 3 complain about the tolerant attitude of villagers to the loud and abusive 4 alcoholics who loiter about the sidewalks in front of their brownstones.

5 All I am suggesting is that we deal with the difficult street problem 6 as a whole and with equal consideration to those who want to use the 7 sidewalks and those who work or live adjacent to these same sidewalks.
8 One group of street sellers should not be unduly punished for their sidewalk 9 solicitations without attempting first, if necessary and constitutionally 10 feasible, to make uniform rules and regulations regarding public sidewalk 11 activities, particularly those in front of persons' places of business and 12 residence.

13 And Judge Taylor concluded her talk:

14 "Whenever I forget and for a moment think, Goddesslike, that I can do 15 good and help rather than apply the appropriate standard of 'the least harm,' I 16 repeat to myself a particularly apposite quote from an appeal of one of the more 17 tragic Family Court cases. In this case, a mother, totally frustrated in her attempts 18 to get Family Court to return her child to her, committed suicide. The Appellate 19 Court, admonishing the Family Court, said, 'Of all tyrannies a tyranny sincerely 20 exercised for the good of its victims may be the most oppressive. Those who torment 21 us for our own good will torment us without end for they do so with the approval 22 of their own conscious.'"

23 On its face, the solicitation portion of Section 647(b) is not a "reasonable 24 regulation" of time, place, and manner. It forbids all solicitations calculated to 25 obtain consent to engage in private sexual relations with other adults for a consideration.
26 Therefore, until authoritatively construed by an appellate court with power to create 27 statewide precedent, that solicitation portion of the statute is unconstitutionally 28 overbroad. Private and discreet solicitations appear to be prohibited as well as 29 public and offensive solicitations.

30 Since private sexual conduct between consenting adults is statutorily 31 recognized and is constitutionally protected, a person must have the right to solicit 32 for that consent. For many persons, such consent will not be forthcoming from the 33 partner of their choosing, unless they offer some form of consideration. A total 34 prohibition of such an attempt to privately and nonoffensively solicit such consent 35 from a willing listener violates the free speech clauses of the State and Federal 36 Constitutions, particularly the California constitution, since it would be restricting

1 the content of speech when there has been no "abuse of this right" of free speech.

2 In the case of Di Lorenzo v. City of Pacific Grove (1968) 67 Cal.Rptr. 3, 3 5, the Court noted that although the government may issue reasonable regulations as 4 to such matters, "the right to regulate does not necessarily sanction the outright 5 prohibition."

6 The Di Lorenzo court made several other pertinent observations about 7 legal distinctions which are involved in the instant case:

8 In determining First Amendment rights a distinction is to be made 9 between communications transmitted to willing recipients and messages 10 forced upon those who do not wish to receive them

11 "The right of free speech is guaranteed every citizen that he may 12 reach the minds of willing listeners, and to do so there must be opportunity 13 to win their attention"

14 Plaintiff is permitted to hand her newspaper to any Pacific Grove 15 householder who will accept it, and to solicit consent to thereafter throw 16 the paper onto the premises. (Emphasis added) Di Lorenzo, at 7.

17 The Court recognized that the requirement of the ordinance compelling 18 consent from the homeowner before throwing newspapers on his premises was reasonable.
19 The ordinance in question did not suffer constitutional infirmity because it allowed 20 the publisher to seek that necessary consent.

21 In the instant case, the statute appears to prevent one from seeking 22 consent from a potentially willing adult by means of any solicitation which involves 23 the offering of any consideration. This is wherein the defect lies with the solicitation 24 portion of the statute. Many such solicitations can be made in ways which in no 25 way abuse the constitutional right of free speech.

26 If it is possible to do so, an appellate court must attempt to constitutionally 27 interpret a statute which appears to be constitutionally defective. Pryor v. Municipal 28 Court, supra, at 253. However, until so authoritatively construed, the statute is 29 unconstitutional on its face.

30 The solicitation portion of section 647(b) may be capable of a constitutional 31 construction. Commercial speech is subject to reasonable regulation by the state.
32 Constitutional infirmities with the solicitation portion may disappear if it is limited 33 to the prohibition of public solicitations for commercial sexual conduct which the 34 speaker knows or should know will be heard by or is directed to a person who may 35 be offended by the solicitation. Thus the prohibition would be limited to commercially 36 oriented speech which is thrust on listeners who may be offended. There is sufficient

1 state interest to prohibit such commercial speech. The state has a right to enact 2 reasonable regulations to protect the privacy of other citizens and to prevent the 3 advertisers' message from being thrust upon a captive and unwilling audience.

4 In the area of noncommercial speech, the fact that the speech is or may 5 be offensive is no reason for prohibiting that speech. Cohen v. California (1971) 91 6 S.Ct. 1780. However, commercial speech is subject to reasonable regulation and such 7 a regulation as defined in the previous paragraph would appear to be reasonable.

8 Such a regulation would be analagous to the regulation of public sexual 9 conduct in California under Section 647(a) of the Penal Code. The Supreme Court 10 held that even though sexual conduct occurs in a place that is technically public, 11 there is little state interest in prohibiting such conduct absent a showing that a 12 person is present who may be offended. Pryor, supra, at 256. Thus, in order to 13 convict a person for engaging in lewd conduct in public, the prosecution must prove 14 that the defendant knew or should have known that the observer was a person who 15 may be offended.

16 If construed as previously defined, the solicitation portion of section 17 647(b) would appear to be a rational balancing of the constitutional rights of those 18 who wish to secure consent for a sexual act to be performed in a private place, on 19 the one hand, and the rights of pedestrians and others to be free from unwanted and 20 sometimes harassing commercial sexual solicitations in public places, on the other 21 hand.

CONCLUSION

In asserting that the rights guaranteed the American people by the Federal Constitution go beyond those rights specifically enumerated, Judge Craven states:

"An individual should retain the right to engage in any form of activity unless there exists a counter-veiling state interest of sufficient weight to justify restricting his conduct. This is the essence of personhood: a rebuttable presumption that all citizens have a right to conduct their lives free from government regulation. A a minimum, personhood should encompass 'the freedom to do anything which injures no one else.'" Craven, Personhood: The Right to be Let Alone, 1976 Duke L.J. 699, at page 706.

Private sexual relations between consenting adults is constitutionally protected behavior as is the personal decision to engage in such conduct, and such status is not lost merely because some form of consideration may pass between the participants. The state should remain out of the business of regulating the private sexual lives of its citizens. There is no rational basis, much less a compelling state interest for regulating private morality.

The engaging portion of section 647(b) is in conflict with the constitutional rights of sexual privacy and due process and is, therefore, unconstitutional on its face. Although a court should interpret a statute whenever possible to give it a constitutional construction, no such construction is readily available to cure the defects of the engaging portion of this statute.

The engaging portion is easily severable from the soliciting portion of the statute. Thus, in order to avoid defeating the obvious intent of the Legislature to regulate the public aspects of prostitution, it will not be necessary to void the entire subdivision if there is a constitutional construction which may be given to the soliciting portion of the statute. Such an interpretation is possible.

The soliciting portion of the statute can be saved if interpreted as a reasonable regulation of commercial speech rather than a total prohibition of the content of expression. After balancing the interests of the state to prohibit the thrusting of offensive speech on unwilling listeners against the constitutional rights of the individual to solicit consent to engage in private sexual relations with a potential partner, such a construction becomes apparent. The solicitation portion of the statute must be limited to the prohibition of public solicitations of commercial sexual conduct under circumstances where the solicitor knows or should know that a

1 listener is present who may be offended by the solicitation. As so construed the 2 solicitation portion of the statute does not offend the First Amendment protections 3 of free speech or article I, section 2 of the California Constitution. Such a construction 4 allows persons to speak freely, but also makes them responsible for the abuse of this 5 right. Although offensiveness is not, per se, a reason for prohibiting speech because 6 of its content, as so construed, Section 647(b) is not a prohibition of the content of 7 speech. It is a reasonable regulation of certain content, namely, commercial sexual 8 solicitation, in a limited location, namely, in public places or places open to the 9 public, and in a limited manner, namely, in a manner which the defendant knows or 10 should know may offend the listener. As such, it is not an unconstitutional restraint.

11 Such a construction of Section 647(b) comports with the apparent legislative 12 intent underlying Section 647 of the Penal Code. Subdivision (a) of that Section 13 regulates public sexual conduct; subdivision (c) prohibits public accosting and begging 14 for alms; subdivision (d) regulates loitering in public restrooms; subdivision (e) limits 15 wandering and roaming the public streets under criminally suspicious circumstances; 16 subdivision (f) attempts to deal with the public inebriate. As it must be constitutionally 17 interpreted, subdivision (b) prohibits public and offensive commercial sexual solicitations.

18 Furthermore, all of the public aspects of prostitution which the state has 19 a legitimate interest to regulate or prohibit will be covered by this and other statutes.
20 Pimping and pandering are prohibited by section 266h and 266i of the Penal Code.
21 Notwithstanding the decriminalization of private sex for a consideration because of 22 the lack of state interest in such a prohibition, statutes prohibiting pimping and 23 pandering may serve legitimate and possibly compelling state interests, i.e., prevention 24 of corruption and greed in financial transactions involving intimate and personal 25 relations of others. Keeping a disorderly house which disturbs the neighborhood is 26 prohibited by section 316 P.C. Using minors for purposes of prostitution is prohibited 27 by several statutes, e.g., 267 P.C., 309 P.C., 266 P.C. Soliciting or engaging in sex 28 with a minor is prohibited whether or not money is involved under section 647a P.C.
29 (annoying or molesting a minor). Offensive touchings are prohibited under section 30 242 P.C. (battery). Engaging in public sexual conduct or soliciting for such conduct 31 is prohibited — whether consideration is involved or not — under section 647(a) P.C.
32 Finally, local ordinances regulating commercial street solicitations of all sorts would 33 apply with equal strength in this area.

34 Thus, all of the public aspects of prostitution are effectively regulated or 35 prohibited, while private morality is not. This brings the California law into alignment 36 with the laws of most of the rest of the civilized world.

1 As it stands, subdivision (b) of section 647 fails to take into account 2 the foregoing constitutional principles and therefore violates the right to privacy, 3 due process, equal protection and freedom of speech. Since the statute is unconstitu-4 tional on its face, the Demurrer should have been sustained.

5 This court is requested to issue an alternative writ of prohibition, directed 6 to the Los Angeles Municipal Court, ordering it to refrain from proceeding to trial 7 under section 647, subdivision (b) in the case of petitioner and in the companion 8 cases, because of the unconstitutionality of that statute, or to show cause before 9 this court why it should not be so restrained.

10 After a full hearing on the merits of the arguments raised in the petition, 11 this court is requested to grant the following relief:

12 1. Declare the engaging portion of section 647, subdivision (b) to be 13 unconstitutionally over-broad in violation of the right to privacy, due process, and 14 equal protection.

15 2. To recognize that the engaging portion is severable from the soliciting 16 portion of the statute and to enter an order so holding.

17 3. To construe the solicitation portion of the statute as being limited to 18 solicitations in public or in private of sexual conduct for hire, when the solicitor 19 knows or should know of the presence of listeners who may be offended by such 20 solicitation.

21 If the court concludes that such relief is not warranted, petitioners must 22 still be informed as to which definition of "lewd" as used in the prostitution statute 23 will govern their cases when they go to trial. Therefore, in any event, this court is 24 requested to construe the term "lewd" as used in section 647, subdivision (b) as 25 being limited to conduct between persons which "involves the touching of the genitals, 26 buttocks, or female breasts, for purposes of sexual arousal, gratification, annoyance, 27 or offense, when the actor knows or should know of the presence of persons who 28 may be offended by his conduct."

INTRODUCTION

Portions of this study actually began back in December, 1972. On December 11 one of the researchers contacted the Los Angeles Police Department. Thomas Coleman identified himself as a citizen concerned with the recent rise in serious crime in the city. He requested information concerning the allocation of manpower in relation to the seriousness of the crime. He stated that he was particularly interested in the enforcement of "victimless crimes" by the Los Angeles Police.

Coleman's first conversation was with Officer Spayth in the Public Relations Department. Officer Spayth explained that each Division of the L.A.P.D. has a vice unit which is mainly limited to enforcing laws within that particular jurisdiction. In addition to these separate units, there is an "Administrative Vice" division which can patrol the entire city. Spayth added that each vice unit enforces laws regulating gambling, A.B.C. violations, prostitution, "homosexuality" and lewd conduct. Vice officers are taken from the ranks of patrolmen. Usually, when a vice officer is assigned to vice patrol he remains in that capacity for a period of 18 months. Male vice officers are used almost exclusively to enforce these laws. When female officers are used, which is seldom, they generally work on pornography cases. Officer Spayth further emphasized that it is the current policy of the Department to place emphasis on arresting female prostitutes rather than their male customers. He justified this policy by explaining that it was the concern of the Department to eliminate prostitution and that this goal could be met by strictly arresting the prostitutes. Spayth further added that major policy decisions (such as the number of women used on vice units or the type of arrests that should be made) come from the office of the Chief of Police.

Coleman had further conversations on December 11 with Officer Healy (Rampart Division), Officer Rembald (Hollywood Division) and Officer Madris (Central Division). In these conversations it was discovered that in these 3 divisions there are approximately 575 patrolmen. Of this total 5 are women.

The fact that women are not used on patrol and in various other capacities as currently caused a controversy in Los Angeles. On March 16, 1973, Sgt. Fanchon Blake, a 25 year veteran of the department, filed charges with federal and state authorities accusing the Los Angeles Police Department of discriminating against women in violation of the Civil Rights Act. "Sgt. Blake told (police) commission representatives that policewomen presently cannot be promoted above the rank of sergeant or Investigator II, that their assignments are restricted, that no policewomen have been hired since Davis became Chief..." Los Angeles Times, March 17, Part II, page 1.

We have collected the names of over 150 vice officers working within seven of the divisions of the police department. These officers were employed in this capacity during the months of June through December, 1972. None of these officers are women.

RESEARCH METHOD

This study concerns the enforcement of section 647(b) of the California Penal Code by the Los Angeles Police Department. Section 647(b) prohibits soliciting or engaging in prostitution. The sample is limited to complaints filed in Division 81 of the Los Angeles Municipal Court for the period of December, 1972 through January, 1973. Division 81 services several of the Divisions of the L.A.P.D. including, Hollywood, Central, Rampart, Newton, Wilshire, Southwest, Northeast and 77th.

During this two month period there was a total of 376 complaints filed by the City Attorney for alleged violations of section 647(b). We reviewed 304 or 81 percent of all complaints filed. The remaining complaints were not available for review because cases were at trial or the paperwork was otherwise in transit. However, all cases which were available in the Clerk's office were carefully reviewed. In reading the complaints and the police reports the researchers noted the following information:

1. Case number
2. Date complaint was filed
3. Name of offender
4. Gender of offender
5. Arresting officer's name and serial number
6. Police division in which arrest was made
7. Complaining witness
9. Location of arrest
10. Disposition of case
11. Type of offense: soliciting or engaging

TYPE OF OFFENSE
(see statistical breakdown)

The overwhelming number of arrests were for soliciting. Most were the result of a direct conversation on the street between a person and a plainclothes vice officer. The conversation usually went as follows:

Person: "Hi, what are you up to tonight?"
 Officer: "Oh, not too much."
 Person: "Would you be interested in having some fun?"
 Officer: "What do you mean by 'fun'?"
 Person: "You know, I could take care of you."
 Officer: "Well, how would you take care of me?"
 Person: "I could ___you or I could ___you."
 Officer: "What do you charge?"
 Person: "I charge $---for___ and $---for ___."

In many cases the solicitor was very cautious and would only reluctantly explain to the officer what he would get for his money.

Only 7 of the solicitation arrests were the result of a newspaper ad. In these cases the officer would make arrangements to meet the person at a specific location. Once at the place the officer would start a conversation and eventually get propositioned. These arrests invariably occurred at private residences.

In over 95 percent of the cases the only victim of the solicitation was a plainclothes vice officer. The remaining 5 percent involved no victim at all. In the non-victim cases the officer would follow a suspected man and woman to a motel room. The officer would stand outside the door and listen to the conversation inside. He would usually report that he had overheard the following conversation:

Man: "Well, take your clothes off."
 Woman: "Before I ___you, I want my money."
 Man: "How much do you want?"
 Woman: "I want $---".
 Man: "O.K., now here it is, get undressed!"

Upon hearing that conversation the officer would get the pass key from the manager and would enter the room to make the arrest.

Most of the cases involved a specific amount of money. However, one case was noteworthy because it involved "other consideration". In that case, Officer Bosse of the Hollywood Division was patrolling the Sunset and LaBrea area in an unmarked car. He pulled over to a bus stop and asked the woman on the bench if she wanted a ride. At first she hesitated, but then she reconsidered. She got into his car and told him that she was going to such-and-such a street. Officer Bosse stated that he was not going that far. The woman then stated: "I'll let you 'screw' me if you take me all the way." Officer Bosse then arrested the woman for a violation of section 647(b).

METHOD OF ENFORCEMENT
(see statistical breakdown)

The overwhelming majority of all arrests made involved a plainclothes vice officer as the only complaining witness. Only 13 arrests (5 percent) were made by uniformed officers. In most cases, when the arresting officer was uniformed the arrest was of the motel room eavesdropping variety.

In only three cases was the complaining witness a private citizen. However, in all three cases the witness was the same person. It appears from the arrest reports that he was working for the police in the Wilshire Division as an informant. On one occasion he was accompanied by Officers Nelson and Genteel to a massage parlor. The officers waited outside while the informant entered the building. He then paid the cashier and was directed to a room. He undressed and the masseuse entered. She would massage his back and then request that he turn over. She would continue to massage his legs and chest, but requested more money to "go further". He would give her some additional money. She would apply some lubrication to his pubic area and would masturbate his erect penis until he ejaculated. The informant then dressed and informed the officers of the violation. They took his statement and secured an arrest warrant. This same procedure was followed on two other occasions with the assistance of Officers Sprankle and Galloway. On all three occasions the Informant allowed the masseuse to masturbate him to the point of ejaculation. On one occasion the defendant was found not guilty at trial while on the second the case was dismissed.

CATEGORIZATION OF OFFENDER
(see statistical breakdown)

The majority of the persons arrested were either female or were homosexual males. Only 13 (4 percent) of those arrested were heterosexual males. In virtually all the cases where the defendant was a heterosexual male the arresting officer was uniformed..

In at least 4 of the cases reviewed, while both the man and woman were caught by the officers engaging in prostitution, only the woman was arrested. In one of these cases, Officers Stovall and Ramsdale were on footpatrol in the Central Division (downtown L.A.). They observed 2 marines approach a woman on the street. They eventually met up with a second woman. The two men and the two women walked to a nearby motel while the officers followed. The two couples went to a room which was registered to the marines. The officers stationed themselves outside the door to listen. With their ears to the door, the officers overheard a solicitation. They obtained a pass key from the manager and entered the room. The officers observed each marine engaged in a sexual act with a woman. The marines admitted to the officers that they had picked up the women and had paid them for sexual services. The officers arrested the women and let the men go free. One woman received 180 days in jail and the other received a sentence of 60 days.

Focusing on the heterosexual situation of all persons arrested 205 were women and 13 were heterosexual males. Since our society is comprised of approximately equal numbers of heterosexual males and females this ratio seems rather disproportionate.

Focusing on the homosexual situation of all males arrested 87 percent were homosexual while only 13 percent were heterosexual. violations. Since the Kinsey statistics indicate that approximately 4 percent of the adult male population is homosexual, these figures also seem grossly disproportionate.

DISPOSITION OF CASES
(see statistical breakdown)

We next must focus not on the practices of the L.A.P.D. but on the City Attorney's office and the Court. Again, the statistics speak for themselves. While the city attorney offered 94 percent of the females and 95 percent of the homosexual males a disposition of either 647(b) or 602(L) with 2 years probation, only 12 percent of the heterosexual males received such an offer. Instead the heterosexual males either received an offer of 415 (disturbing the peace) with 1 year probation or no probation, or they received an outright dismissal of the case. In contrast, only 3 percent of the females and 5 percent of the homosexual males received an offer of a 415 or a dismissal. We speak of an "offer" by the city attorney but these figures actually represent the actual order of the court in disposing of the case. However, the "offer" and the disposition are usually the same because the court merely "rubber stamps" the city attorney's final offer.

SENTENCES IMPOSED
(see statistical breakdown)

In Division 81 the conditions of probation usually associated with a violation of section 647(b) are:

1. Obey all laws.
2. Submit to and cooperate in field interrogation by any peace officer any time of the day or night.
3. Carry at all times a valid California driver's license or Department of Motor Vehicles Identification card containing your true name, age, current address, and shall display such identification upon request to any peace officer or officer of the court upon request and not use any other name for any purpose.
4. Not solicit or accept a ride from motorists or be parked in a motor vehicle with lone male motorists.
5. Not approach male pedestrians or motorists or engage them in conversation upon a public street or in a public place.
6. Not occupy a motel room unless registered in your true name.

Of the females arrested, 182 (90 percent) had conditions 1-6 imposed on them for a period of 2 years. Of the homosexual males arrested, 81 (94 percent) received conditions 1-6. No heterosexual males arrested received conditions 1-6.

Most of the persons arrested for violations of 647(b) received varying jail sentences. 163 of the women (80 percent) received from 5 days to 180 days in jail. Of the homosexual males arrested, 80 (94 percent) spent from 5 to 90 days in jail. Only 2 heterosexual males spent 5 days in jail.

TO THE HONORABLE ROSE ELIZABETH BIRD, CHIEF JUSTICE, AND THE HONORABLE ASSOCIATE JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT OF THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA:

Real Party in Interest, the People of the State of California, having read and considered the opinion filed in the above entitled case on September 7, 1979, requests that this Court modify that opinion in three respects. First, the statement of the Court's ruling appearing on pages 2 and 26 of the slip opinion should be clarified regarding the necessity of the presence of a person who may be offended by a public lewd act. Second, this requirement that persons who may be offended be present should be made separate from the definition of the term "lewd". Finally, the printer's error appearing in footnote 11 on page 22 of the slip opinion should be corrected.

THE OPINION SHOULD BE MODIFIED TO REQUIRE ONLY A REASONABLE LIKELIHOOD THAT A PERSON WHO MAY BE OFFENDED WILL BE PRESENT

The statements of the Court's ruling appearing on pages 2 and 26 of the slip opinion suggest that in order for a violation of Penal Code section 647(a) to occur, someone who may be offended must actually be present. As stated on page 26 of the slip opinion, such a violation can occur only

"if the actor knows or should know of the presence of persons who may be offended by his conduct."

(Emphasis added.)

This language conflicts with the opinion's approval of the quoted portion of In re Steinke (1969) 2 Cal.App.3d 569, 576 appearing on page 25 of the slip opinion:

150

"the gist of the offense proscribed in [Penal Code section 647] subdivision (a)
... is the presence or possibility of someone to be offended by the conduct."
(Emphasis added.)

The apparent conflict over whether a violation of section 647(a) can occur only if the accused should have known that an onlooker was actually present, or whether it is sufficient that the accused should have known it was likely the conduct would be observed will to create substantial problems. One important example will occur in prosecutions for solicitation of a public lewd act. It is clear that such a solicitation is not prohibited under section 647(a) unless the act solicited is prohibited by the section. If the actual presence of an onlooker were required for an act to violate section 647(a), it would follow that an element of the crime of solicitation must be that the solicited act would actually take place in the presence of an onlooker. As a practical matter, however, this would be impossible to prove if the solicitation were for an act to occur in a public place some distance from the location where the solicitation is made. Further, it would be anomalous for the legality of a solicitation for a lewd act to occur in a public place frequently used by the public (such as a park, beach, or sidewalk) to be contingent upon the fortuitous circumstance of whether the People can prove that someone actually would have been present when the act occurred.

The rule of In re Steinke, supra, 2 Cal.App.3d 569, 576, avoids these problems while providing for more consistent enforcement of the section and better protecting the public's interest in preventing open sexual conduct which may offend unwilling viewers. This approach would prohibit the solicitation of lewd acts which are to occur in a public place where it is likely there will be persons present who may be offended. This will avoid the prospect of a police officer who either receives or overhears such a solicitation from rushing off to the proposed site of the sexual conduct to see if anyone would be present to establish probable cause for arrest.

In addition to the problem in solicitation cases, a difficult situation occurs in cases in which the only two persons present during the commission of a lewd act are the defendant and a plainclothes police officer. Frequently, the only effective method of both detecting repeat violators of section 647(a) and deterring future violations is by the use of undercover officers who provide the opportunity for the commission of such an offense. If, for example, the officer does not object to a sexual touching, the defendant might well be reasonable in believing the officer would not be offended. The defendant could then assert that a reasonable belief that no one was present who might be offended when the act occurred, even though it was quite likely that an onlooker might have arrived at any moment, provides a complete defense to the charge, thus, the legality of the act would be conditioned on whether a third person happened to pass by. In fact, an act which was apparently legal at its inception due to the absence of such a third person might become illegal when an onlooker arrived.

These problems could be avoided without altering the essence of the opinion by inserting the word "likely" into the statement of the Court's ruling appearing on pages 2 and 26 of the slip opinion, to wit:

"by a person who knows or should know of the likely presence of persons who may be offended by the conduct."

In addition, the same considerations support a similar modification of the statement appearing on page 25 of the slip opinion to read,

"the state has little interest in prohibiting that conduct if it is unlikely that anyone will be present who may be ^{12/}offended."

THE DEFINITION OF THE TERM "LEWD" SHOULD NOT BE TIED TO THE REQUIREMENT THAT SOMEONE WHO MAY BE OFFENDED BE PRESENT

Although the opinion clearly states that the definition of the terms "lewd" and "dissolute" set forth apply only to section 647(a), the phrasing of that definition on page 26 of the slip opinion may cause substantial confusion. The last clause of that definition seemingly limits the term "lewd" to refer only to acts performed when "the actor knows or should know of the presence of persons who may be offended by his conduct." It can be expected that an attempt will be made to apply this definition to other statutes employing the term "lewd", such as Penal Code sections 647(b) (prostitution) and 11225 (Red Light Abatement).

This potential source of confusion can easily be limited without altering this Court's ruling. This could be accomplished by moving the clause "if the actor knows or should know of the presence of persons who may be offended by his conduct" from the sentence defining the term "lewd" and including it in the next sentence. Incorporating both this change and the change suggested in section I above, the Court's ruling on page 26 of the slip opinion would read as follows:

"For the foregoing reasons, we arrive at the following construction of section 647, subdivision (a): The terms "lewd" and "dissolute" in this section are synonymous, and refer to conduct which involves the touching of the genitals, buttocks, or female breast for the purpose of sexual arousal, gratification, annoyance or offense. The statute prohibits such conduct only if the actor knows or should know of the likely presence of persons who may be offended by his conduct and it occurs in any public place or in any place open to the public or exposed to public view...."

The above phrasing would clarify the fact that the requirement of the possibility of an offended onlooker applies solely to section 647(a) and is not necessarily intended to be part of the definition of the word "lewd" as that term is used in any other statute.

III

THE WORD "VIOLENT" SHOULD BE INSERTED IN PLACE OF THE WORD "PUBLIC" IN THE QUOTE IN FOOTNOTE 11

A printer's error appears in footnote 11 on page 22 of the slip opinion. In the quoted portion of Penal Code section 415, subdivision (3), the phrase should read "an immediate violent reaction" rather than "an immediate public reaction."

(2) Opposes Real Party's proposal that the definition of "lewd" be made separate from the requirement of the presence of a person who may be offended.

(3) Agrees that the printer's error appearing in footnote 11 on page 22 of the slip opinion should be corrected.

THE PRINTER'S ERROR SHOULD BE CORRECTED

Petitioner has no objection to the correcting of the printer's error at page 22 in footnote 11 as specified by Real Party.

CREATE SUBSTANTIAL FIRST AMENDMENT

PROBLEMS WHERE NONE NOW EXIST

Real Party has asked this Court to modify its Opinion because, under that Opinion, Real Party contends that prosecutions for solicitation will be difficult, evidence gathering will be more time consuming, and prosecutors and police may have problems getting convictions.

Actually, some prosecutions will not be difficult at all, especially in those situations in which the solicitor asks that a sexual act be performed "here and now". The arresting officer can easily testify to a jury concerning the circumstances, surroundings, and persons present in such an immediate time and place. If the sexual act would be criminal under such circumstances and if the prosecution can prove the defendant intended for the sexual act to be performed under those circumstances, a conviction would follow.

The types of prosecutions made difficult or precluded under the Opinion are justifiably thus limited. Real Party seems to have overlooked the longstanding principle "(T)hat the constitutional guarantees of free speech and free press do not permit a State to forbid or proscribe advocacy of the use of force or of law violation except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action." Bradenburg v. Ohio (1969) 89 S.Ct. 1827.

The present Opinion is consistent with this principle. The prosecution must prove defendant had the specific intent that the crime be committed. This is the gist of the solicitation portion of the statute. When a person engages in conversation with another regarding the possibility of the two engaging in sexual conduct at some future time and at some distant place, who is to say whether the solicitor intended that a crime be committed. After actually reaching the proposed destination the solicitor may evaluate the situation and decide to abort the proposed sexual activity because of the presence of others who might be offended.

As the Opinion now reads, it protects the interest of the state in prohibiting the solicitation of imminent lawless action by means likely to produce such action. At the same time the First Amendment rights of those who have conversations regarding possible sexual conduct are protected. This balancing of interests should not now be upset by Real Party's suggested modification because police or prosecutors wish to have people convicted without the necessity of conducting investigations as to whether or not the circumstances surrounding the commission of the sexual act would lower it to a crime. Expediency and administrative convenience have never been sufficient to shift that balance where First Amendment rights are involved.

In conclusion on this point, if the defendant wants the sexual act to occur in a public place at or near where the conversation occurs and at or near in time to the conversation, very little is required by way of investigation to determine if the commission of the sex act would be a crime. If, however, the defendant suggests a sexual act to occur at some time and place remote from the time and place of the conversation, who is to say whether the defendant intends for a crime to be committed. He may honestly feel that no one will overlook the activity at that location and he may have a reasonable expectation that the proposed location will be private and out of public view. With such a state of mind, under this opinion as well as under the holding of Brandenburg, above, such a defendant should not be convicted.

OTHER "PROBLEMS" RAISED BY REAL PARTY ARE SOLVED

BY A PROPER READING OF THE PRESENT OPINION

- A. The language of Steinke cited by this Court in its Opinion is not inconsistent with the holding in the Opinion.

At page 25 of the slip Opinion this Court quoted from In re Steinke, supra, (1969) 2 C.A.3d 569, 576; "the gist of the offense proscribed in [Penal Code Section 647] subdivision (a) . . . is the presence or possibility of someone to be offended by the conduct." Real Party is interpreting this language a certain way, i.e. the possible presence of someone to be offended. Petitioner interprets this language to mean the presence of someone who will be offended or the presence of someone who possibly will be offended. Either reading of this language would seem reasonable. Because both interpretations are reasonable and one supports the Opinion of this Court while the other apparently conflicts with it, the reading which supports the Opinion should be adopted.

- B. Assuming, arguendo, the inconsistency of the Steinke language with the holding of this Court, a proper reading of the full Opinion resolves the conflict.

In footnote 13 on page 26 of the slip Opinion, this Court stated "language in the following decisions inconsistent with the present opinion is disapproved: . . . In re Steinke, supra, 2 Cal.App.3d 569;" thus, any apparent conflict which

Real Party visualizes is resolved by this footnote; there is no conflict since the footnote disapproves of any conflicting language. Therefore, the only remaining interpretation of the Steinke language is the interpretation set forth by Petitioner in the paragraph above which supports the holding of the Court, i.e. "the presence of someone who will be offended or the presence of someone who possibly will be offended."

- C. The problems cited by Real Party at page 4 of the Petition for Modification, are spurious.

At page 4 of the Petition for Modification Real Party sets forth a hypothetical prosecution for a sexual touching of a plainclothes officer. When one person touches the crotch area of another person and only those two persons are present (without any onlookers) the person who is touched should not complain if he expressly or impliedly consented to the touching. In essence, this is a battery. When such touchings are prosecuted as violations of Section 242 P.C. (battery) the test for innocence is whether the defendant had a reasonable belief that the person he touched would not object to the touching. See People v. Sanchez (1978) 8 C.A.3d Supp. 1. The Opinion of this Court in the instant case merely brings the lewd conduct law into conformity with the law of battery when there are no onlookers who might be offended. If there are onlookers and if the defendant should know that they are likely to be offended, then a conviction for lewd conduct might occur, even if the person whose crotch is touched does not object.

Real Party discusses this hypothetical situation as if it creates a problem -- Petitioner fails to see what that problem might be.

At page 5 of the Petition for Modification, Real Party raises other false problems. Basically Real Party argues that the Opinion should be modified because of its potential effect on other sexual statutes. However, Real Party does not demonstrate how other statutes will be adversely affected. Real Party proposes that this Court separate its holding that someone must be present who may be offended from its definition of "lewd." At least for purposes of Section 647(a) and its definition of "lewd", this separation would not conform to this Court's Opinion as expressed at the bottom of page 24 and top of page 25 of the slip opinion, namely that, as to "lewd conduct," "A constitutionally specific definition must be limited to conduct of a type likely to offend." Likelihood of offense is the essence of the crime and provides the state interest. The separation which Real Party proposes is not merely a grammatical change; it would now seem to countermand the constitutional requirement of a limited definition. The Opinion should, therefore, remain unchanged in this respect.

The ultimate shaping and honing of the ramifications of Pryor on other statutes are properly the responsibility of appellate courts in prosecutions for violations of those statutes. It is not the responsibility of this Court in the case at bar to render an advisory opinion as to how other sexual statutes may be affected. While such a discussion might make for an interesting law review article, possible ramifications, if any exist, are not properly before this Court in the context of an actual case or controversy.

THE OPINION IS INTERNALLY CONSISTENT

The Opinion of this Court is internally consistent, precise, and clear, well thought out, and consonant with constitutional principles. Thus, modification is inappropriate.
